SP Nine — The Self-Preservation Peacemaker

HIGH CONFIDENCE

This report is designed as a session prep tool — organized around the debrief conversation you'll have with your client, not around how the assessment engine arrived at its hypothesis. Read Section 1 for the quick read. Use Sections 2 through 5 as a companion during the debrief itself. Section 6 offers contingency guidance depending on how the conversation unfolds.

THE READ

This client came in with some of the clearest Type 9 Stage 0 language you'll see — 'peaceful, easygoing, go-with-the-flow, steady calming presence' is almost a direct quotation from the Nine idealized self-image. What makes this particularly interesting is the shadow: 'I lose my own momentum; I forget what I actually want' is not hedged, not framed as someone else's observation — the client owns it directly, which suggests a degree of self-awareness about the pattern that gives you something real to work with immediately. The 'hard to read' descriptor from others is worth noting: it points to the inner life being invisible even to those close to them, which is consistent with a Nine whose inner world has been quietly subordinated for a long time. The SP instinct with HIGH confidence rounds out a picture of someone whose peace is maintained through comfort, routine, and stability — and for whom forward motion is the thing most quietly sacrificed. The overall confidence here is as clean as it gets: every stage confirmed, no redirects, no ambiguity.

GOING IN

- Confidence is HIGH across the board — Stage 1, 2, 3, and 4 all pointed cleanly to Type 9 SP. You can open with genuine conviction while staying in hypothesis mode.

- The client is likely to recognize the self-description strongly — they already articulated the shadow in their own words. The recognition conversation should feel like a homecoming rather than a confrontation.
- Watch for the possibility that strong recognition leads to passive acceptance rather than active engagement — Nines can 'yes' a debrief in a way that doesn't actually create movement. Your job is to keep inviting them into their own experience rather than letting them merge with the hypothesis.
- The 'hard to read' descriptor from others is a useful doorway — it points to the gap between the client's inner life and what others can access. This is worth naming gently: their peace is real, and something is not being communicated.
- No counter-type flags, no lookalike ambiguity, no redirects. This is a clean debrief — the work is in depth, not disambiguation.

2 • DEBRIEFING CORE MOTIVATION AND WORLDVIEW

How to present the heart of the type and connect it to their own words.

THE CORE PATTERN

- The Nine's core motivation is the desire for inner peace and a sense of union or connection with the world — and the avoidance of conflict, disruption, and anything that would shatter the equilibrium they've worked to maintain.
- The Nine worldview is organized around a fundamental belief that their own presence and desires are less important than keeping things harmonious — not because they're selfless (that's the Two), but because their own agenda feels like a source of potential conflict or disruption. Disappearing is the solution.
- The cost of this strategy is enormous and usually invisible to the Nine themselves: over time, they genuinely lose track of what they want. This isn't performed — it's structural. The self has been organized around not being a disturbance.
- The 'stubborn' descriptor from others points to the Nine's body-based resistance: when pushed, Nines don't fight back — they stop. Passive resistance is the Nine's anger expression, and the client is unlikely to have framed it as anger.

WHAT THEIR RESPONSES SHOWED

- The client's self-description — 'peaceful, easygoing, go-with-the-flow, steady calming presence' — is a direct expression of the Nine idealized self-image. These are not aspirational words; they read as genuinely descriptive, which suggests the pattern is well-established.
- The greatest strength — 'stability and presence — I keep things grounded' — shows the Nine's gift clearly: they are the container of calm for others. Note that the strength is defined relationally (I keep things grounded — for whom?) rather than internally.
- The most problematic quality — 'I lose my own momentum; I forget what I actually want' — is almost verbatim Nine shadow language. The use of 'forget' rather than 'sacrifice' or 'give up' is telling: this isn't experienced as a choice, it's experienced as a disappearance.
- The 'hard to read' descriptor from others is consistent with the Nine's inner world becoming genuinely opaque — not just to others, but eventually to the client themselves. This is the shadow operating below the waterline.

COACHING NOTES

- Lead with the gift before the shadow — name the real value of what the client brings before moving into the cost. For Nines, being seen as genuinely valuable (not just agreeable) is meaningful.
- When you introduce 'I forget what I actually want,' stay with it longer than you think you need to. Ask them to locate a specific recent example. The abstract framing ('I lose my own momentum') is a Nine move — they've made it philosophical. Bring it into the body and the specific.
- Watch for agreement that's too easy. When they nod and say 'yes, that's me,' gently probe: 'What does it feel like when you notice that happening?' Not 'do you agree with this description' — 'what do you notice?'

Try asking: 'When you said you forget what you actually want — can you think of a recent moment when that happened? What was going on, and what did you do instead?'

3 · DEBRIEFING PATTERNS OF THINKING, FEELING, AND BEHAVING

What to expect and what to watch for as you walk through type patterns.

CENTERS OF INTELLIGENCE

Body Center		0 / 18
Heart Center		0 / 18
Head Center		0 / 18

LIKELY TO RESONATE EASILY

- A natural ability to create calm and safety in environments and relationships
- Genuine empathy and the capacity to hold multiple perspectives without judgment
- A grounded, steady presence that others instinctively trust and find reassuring

MAY TAKE MORE CAREFUL UNPACKING

- Self-forgetting — losing touch with your own priorities, desires, and voice in the process of accommodating others
- Inertia — difficulty initiating action, especially on your own behalf, leading to procrastination or passive drift
- Conflict avoidance — a tendency to go along or stay quiet rather than assert a position, even when your perspective matters deeply

MAY BE HARDEST TO SEE

- The client almost certainly does not experience their self-forgetting as a strategy — it will feel like just how they are, or like a natural preference for ease. The idea that there is an agenda underneath that has been suppressed may be genuinely new and possibly destabilizing. Move slowly here.
- Anger will be the hardest thing to surface. 'Sometimes stubborn' from others is the tell — but the client is unlikely to have named or recognized this as anger. For SP Nines especially, anger tends to show up as inertia, lateness, or quiet immovability rather than expressed frustration. They may be genuinely surprised that others experience it as stubbornness.

- The gap between being 'steady' and 'calming' for others and being 'hard to read' is a meaningful clinical signal: it suggests the client is fluent in creating an experience of peace for their environment while their actual inner state remains inaccessible — possibly even to themselves.

HOW THE CLIENT APPEARS TO MOVE — THE THREE FRAMEWORK SIGNALS

These are cross-referenced patterns that showed up consistently in their responses. Each offers a different lens on the type — worth weaving in conversationally rather than introducing as categories.

SOCIAL STYLE — WITHDRAWING

- As a Withdrawn type, this client maintains their sense of self by pulling back into an inner world — or, in the Nine's case, by self-forgetting in a way that amounts to the same thing: they're not fully present to either the inner or outer world.
- The 'hard to read' descriptor from others is consistent with withdrawal: not dramatic retreat, but a quiet unavailability. They're present in the room, calm and grounding — and simultaneously not fully there.
- For SP Nines especially, withdrawal often looks like comfort and routine rather than obvious absence — they're engaged with their immediate environment, but disengaged from the relational and motivational demands of the world beyond it.

Weave in: 'When you pull back — and I wonder if you even notice when it happens — where do you go? What are you looking for in that space?'

EMOTIONAL STYLE — POSITIVE

- As a Positive Outlook type, this client tends to reframe difficulty in ways that emphasize ease and minimize disruption — not through denial exactly, but through a genuine orientation toward the path of least resistance.
- The 'go-with-the-flow' language is a Positive Outlook signature: the client has organized their self-description around a kind of benign acceptance. This is a real and valuable quality — and it can also mean that genuine difficulty, frustration, or anger gets quietly smoothed over before it can be worked with.
- In a coaching context, watch for the Positive Outlook pattern showing up as 'that's fine' or 'I'm okay with it' when something is actually not fine. The client may not be being dishonest — they may have genuinely convinced themselves.

Weave in: 'When something doesn't go the way you wanted — what's the first thing you do with that? Do you notice yourself moving toward acceptance pretty quickly?'

ATTACHMENT STYLE — ATTACHMENT

- As an Attachment type, this client's sense of self is organized around relationship to others — specifically, the need to remain connected and not become a source of disruption or disconnection.
- This explains why the Nine's self-forgetting is not simply laziness or passivity: it's a relational strategy. Staying 'go-with-the-flow' and being 'reliable and kind' keeps the connections intact. The cost — losing their own momentum and desires — is paid in private.
- The Attachment pattern means the client's motivation is fundamentally relational even when it looks self-contained. The stability they create is, in part, in service of maintaining bonds — something worth surfacing when exploring what drives the pattern.

Weave in: 'When you think about the people you're closest to — what would it mean for them, or for those relationships, if you pushed harder for what you wanted?'

COACHING NOTES FOR THIS SECTION

- Pacing matters enormously with Nines. Don't rush through the framework signals — let each one land before moving to the next. If they're nodding along too quickly, slow down and ask them to find it in their actual life.
- The Positive Outlook pattern can make this debrief feel smoother than it actually is. A Nine who finds all of this 'interesting and true' may be Positive Outlook-ing the debrief itself. Watch for moments of genuine friction or discomfort — those are the entry points.
- When the body-based probe lands, stay with whatever comes up physically. Nines are Body center types who have dissipated their connection to their own body's signals — any somatic response is diagnostically and therapeutically meaningful.

Try asking: 'If you were to locate the experience of forgetting what you want somewhere in your body — where would you feel it? What does it feel like physically when that happens?'

4 • DEBRIEFING INSTINCT AND SUBTYPE

Their particular flavor of Type 9, and why it matters.

INSTINCT RANKING

SP NINE — THE SELF-PRESERVATION PEACEMAKER — HOW THE INSTINCT SHAPES THE TYPE

- The SP Nine's peace-seeking is organized primarily around the physical and domestic environment: comfort, routine, predictability, and the maintenance of structures that keep daily life running without disturbance. This is a Nine whose inner calm is anchored in the tangible world.
- The client's description of their greatest strength as 'stability and presence — I keep things grounded' is consistent with SP Nine: this is someone who tends to their immediate environment with real care, creating conditions of physical ease for themselves and others.

- The SP Nine's relationship to momentum is particularly interesting: the SP instinct creates a strong pull toward the comfortable and familiar, which in a Nine can mean an enormous investment in maintaining the status quo. Forward motion, change, and ambition can feel like threats to equilibrium rather than opportunities.
- The 'stubborn' descriptor from others is characteristic of SP Nine — this subtype has a quiet but firm resistance to being moved or disturbed. It rarely looks like conflict; it looks like immovability, lateness, or a kind of pleasant unresponsiveness to pressure.

WHY THIS SUBTYPE CAN BE EASY TO MISS

- SP Nines can look highly functional and grounded rather than 'lost' — they're often the person everyone relies on, the one who keeps things steady. The self-forgetting pattern is invisible beneath the competence and reliability.
- The SP instinct can make this Nine look like a Type 1 (conscientious, detail-oriented about their environment) or a Type 2 (caring, reliable, present for others). The distinguishing question is motivation: is the care driven by standards and correctness (1), love-seeking (2), or the maintenance of peace and connection (9)?
- Because the SP Nine's world is organized around comfort and routine, they may not present as obviously 'foggy' or absent — their self-forgetting operates beneath a surface of practical competence. The loss of momentum and desire is real but not always immediately visible.

COACHING NOTES

- When introducing the SP instinct, frame it as a real and valuable orientation — not a limitation. The client's ability to create stability and groundedness is genuine and serves people around them. The exploration is about what the SP instinct costs them personally.
- The most useful entry point for SP Nine is usually the routine: ask what their daily life looks like, what they protect, what would feel most disruptive to lose. That conversation will surface the SP instinct naturally.
- Watch for the client engaging enthusiastically with the 'comfort and routine' framing while staying distant from the 'loss of momentum' dimension. The SP instinct can make the comfortable feel so obviously correct that the client doesn't notice what's been quietly sacrificed.

Try asking: 'What does a day feel like when everything is running as it should — what are you doing, and what does that feel like in your body? And what does it feel like when something disrupts that?'

5 • DEBRIEFING WINGS, LINES, AND RESOURCES

What they have available, especially under pressure.

STRESS MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 6

- Under stress, Nines move toward Type 6 — and this client confirmed the pattern cleanly: increased anxiety, worst-case thinking, and seeking reassurance from others. This is important because the Nine rarely looks anxious in their baseline state; when the 6 energy appears, it can feel confusing and out of character to the client.
- The stress move to 6 is also worth framing as information: when the client notices themselves seeking reassurance or catastrophizing, it's a signal that the Nine's peace has been genuinely disrupted — something that needs attention rather than more soothing.

- For SP Nines especially, the stress move may show up as anxiety about the stability of their physical world — routines being disrupted, domestic situations feeling precarious, or the comfortable structures they depend on coming under threat.

Try asking: 'When you notice the anxiety or worst-case thinking showing up — what usually triggered it? What was being threatened?'

SECURITY MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 3

- In security, Nines move toward Type 3 — and this client recognized the pattern: increased energy, productivity, and a clearer sense of direction and accomplishment. This is meaningful: the momentum and self-direction they described losing access to is actually available to them — it shows up when conditions are safe enough.
- The security move to 3 is one of the most practically useful pieces of the Nine's map. The question 'what makes you feel safe enough to access this?' is a direct route into identifying conditions that support the client's actual growth and aliveness.
- Framing the 3 security move as the client's 'natural capacity' rather than something they have to borrow is important — Nines can feel like the 3 energy isn't really theirs. Naming it as something that lives in them, waiting for the right conditions, is more accurate and more useful.

Try asking: 'When have you felt that kind of energy and clarity — when you knew what you wanted and were moving toward it? What was happening around you at that time?'

WINGS — TYPE 8 AND TYPE 1

- Type 9 has wings at 8 and 1. The 8 wing (Nine with an 8 wing — sometimes called the 'Referee') brings more assertiveness, directness, and willingness to engage conflict when truly necessary. Nines with a strong 8 wing can surprise people with their capacity for decisive action when genuinely provoked.
- The 1 wing (Nine with a 1 wing — sometimes called the 'Dreamer') brings more internal structure, a desire for order and correctness, and a tendency toward idealism. Nines with a strong 1 wing may have stronger opinions than they express and a quiet critical voice they rarely share.
- The 'sometimes stubborn' descriptor from others and the emphasis on stability could be consistent with either wing — stubborn immovability has a 9-with-8-wing quality, while the emphasis on 'steady' and 'grounded' has a 9-with-1-wing quality. Let the client lead in identifying which feels more resonant.
- Don't force the wings conversation — introduce it lightly and let the client's response guide you. The wings frame is often a useful way to add dimensionality once the core type is grounded.

Try asking: 'When you think about yourself in challenging situations — do you tend to find yourself becoming more decisive and direct, or more structured and internally critical? Which feels more like you?'

What to do depending on how they receive the hypothesis.

IF THEY RESONATE STRONGLY

- When the client strongly agrees, resist the pull to stay in the comfortable recognition space — that's the Nine's Positive Outlook pattern doing its work. Move quickly toward the specific and the personal: 'Where do you most feel this right now, in your actual life?'
- Strong recognition is an opening, not a destination. The most useful move is to name the cost explicitly and ask the client to own it: not 'does this resonate?' but 'what has this cost you, in something specific?'
- Watch for recognition landing too smoothly and then being set aside — Nines can genuinely recognize their pattern and then return to baseline without anything changing. The coaching work is to help this recognition become a felt experience rather than an intellectual agreement.

What's one specific situation in your life right now where you can see this pattern costing you something — and what would you want to do differently?

IF THEY PUSH BACK OR DISAGREE

- Do not defend the hypothesis. If the client pushes back, get curious: 'What doesn't fit? What feels wrong about this?' Their answer will be diagnostically useful regardless of type.
- The most likely alternate type for this client is Type 2 — the Attachment object relations result and the 'reliable, kind' descriptors from others could support a Two reading. The key distinguishing question is whether the client's care for others is driven by a need to be needed and loved (2) or by a desire to maintain harmony and connection without disruption (9).
- If they push toward Type 1, explore the 'sometimes stubborn' descriptor — Ones have a different flavor of stubbornness (principled, correctness-driven) than Nines (inertial, peace-maintaining). Ask which feels more like what's actually happening inside.
- If nothing lands, name the ambiguity honestly: 'Some people take a few sessions to find their type — that's completely normal, and it's actually more interesting than a quick fit.'

Most likely alternate type: Type 2 — The Helper

Key distinguishing question: The key distinguishing question is: when you care for others, what are you most afraid of losing — their love and appreciation (Type 2), or the peace and harmony of the connection itself (Type 9)?

IF THEY'RE CONFUSED OR NEED MORE CLARITY

- If the client is confused, find the foothold: go back to their own words. 'You wrote that you forget what you actually want — can you say more about that? What does that feel like from the inside?' Start with what they already named.

- Treat what doesn't fit as equally useful data — if they can articulate what doesn't resonate, that's a meaningful entry point into understanding what does. 'What feels wrong about this description — and what's the word you'd use instead?'
- Confusion in a Nine can sometimes be the Nine pattern itself showing up in the room — genuinely uncertain about their own inner experience, having organized themselves around others' framings for so long that their own read is genuinely unclear. Name this possibility gently if it seems relevant.

Setting aside the type labels for a moment — what's the part of what we've talked about today that felt most true? Start there.
