SX Seven — The Enthusiast in Intensity

HIGH CONFIDENCE

This report is designed as a session prep tool — organized around the debrief conversation you'll have with your client, not around how the assessment engine arrived at its hypothesis. Read Section 1 for the quick read. Use Sections 2 through 5 as a companion during the debrief itself. Section 6 offers contingency guidance depending on how the conversation unfolds.

THE READ

This is a very clean Type 7 read — possibly one of the cleanest you'll see come through an assessment. The Stage 0 language is almost a textbook entry: 'enthusiastic, visionary, creative, full of possibilities, never say never' maps the idealized self-image with almost no noise. The problematic quality — 'impatient... get annoyed when people can't connect the dots as fast as I do' — is an unusually precise and self-aware naming of the Seven shadow, and the fact that it's framed as something others have told them rather than something they fully own is itself diagnostic. The final open response added a behavioral layer that rarely comes through this clearly in a structured assessment: 'I tend to avoid mean people or having to sit with tough things' is a direct self-report of the avoidance structure, and 'I've gotten better about it with age' is a growth edge the client has already located. The confidence here is high at every stage — what will be interesting in the debrief is not confirming the type but exploring what the type is protecting and what the client is already moving toward.

GOING IN

- Confidence is HIGH across all stages — Stage 1, 2, 3, and 4 all aligned independently on Type 7. Present with confidence and let the client do the recognizing.
- Instinct is MEDIUM confidence — SX is the lead but SO is the live alternative. The 'connector' descriptor from others and the interpersonal warmth could support either. Plan a probe in Section 4 to let the client locate this themselves.

- The client is the coach (Cai Delumpa) and built this engine — they will arrive with system knowledge and possibly some pre-formed hypotheses. Hold this lightly; it doesn't change the read, but it may shape how you introduce the debrief. Self-knowledge and type recognition are not the same thing.
- The final open response named avoidance directly and flagged growth around it ('I've gotten better with age'). This is a gift — the client has already identified the developmental edge. The debrief can move faster to depth than with a client who hasn't located this yet.
- Type 5 was the live alternative throughout and is worth a brief acknowledgment — the intellectual depth and systems-building project will resonate with the client. Naming it honestly, and then naming why Seven fits better, will feel accurate rather than reductive.

2 · DEBRIEFING CORE MOTIVATION AND WORLDVIEW

How to present the heart of the type and connect it to their own words.

THE CORE PATTERN

- The Seven's worldview is structured around possibility and the avoidance of pain: the world is abundant, options should stay open, and moving toward the next good thing is not escapism — it is how things work best. This isn't naivety; it's a deeply held operating principle.
- The core emotion underneath the Seven pattern is anxiety — specifically, a fear that if they slow down or let painful things in, something will be lost, closed off, or unbearable. The forward motion is not random; it is purposeful movement away from that felt sense of limitation.
- The Seven's trap is that the very intelligence that generates options and reframes difficulty can also be used to stay just ahead of whatever needs to be felt. The client named this directly: 'I tend to avoid mean people or having to sit with tough things.'
- The idealized self-image — 'I am okay, free, full of possibility' — is the lens through which the client will most quickly recognize the type. Start there and let the shadow layer emerge naturally.

WHAT THEIR RESPONSES SHOWED

- 'Full of possibilities, never say never' and 'enthusiastic, visionary' are the Seven idealization pattern stated plainly — this client knows and owns the forward-facing quality of their energy.
- 'Creative. I found a way to use Claude and Claude Code to create this typing engine' names a characteristic Seven synthesis move: constraint becomes invention, limitation becomes a starting point. The pride in the solution is worth noting — this isn't just competence, it's delight.
- 'Impatient... get annoyed when people can't connect the dots as fast as I do' is the shadow showing up as interpersonal friction. The framing — 'I've been told' — suggests this is slightly more visible to others than fully owned internally. That gap is a useful opening.
- 'I tend to avoid mean people or having to sit with tough things. I've gotten better about it with age, but it's never been my sweet spot.' This is an unusually direct self-report of the avoidance structure. The developmental arc ('gotten better with age') suggests readiness to go deeper.

COACHING NOTES

- Start with the idealized self-image — 'full of possibilities, never say never' — and let the client confirm or expand it. This is genuinely how they see themselves and it will land as recognition rather than analysis.
- Move to the avoidance layer gently. The client has already named it; your job is to slow it down and let them sit with it rather than reframe it. Watch for the reframe happening in real time — that's the pattern demonstrating itself.
- When explanation shows up — particularly explanation of why the impatience is actually useful or justified — consider naming it gently: 'I notice you moved toward explaining that just now; what's happening underneath it?'

Try asking: When you think about a time you felt genuinely stuck — not just slowed down, but actually unable to move forward — what did that feel like, and what did you do with it?

3 · DEBRIEFING PATTERNS OF THINKING, FEELING, AND BEHAVING

What to expect and what to watch for as you walk through type patterns.

CENTERS OF INTELLIGENCE

Body Center		10 / 18
Heart Center		8 / 18
Head Center •		18 / 18

LIKELY TO RESONATE EASILY

- Genuine optimism and the ability to see possibility where others see obstacles
- Quick thinking, versatility, and a gift for synthesizing ideas across domains
- Real warmth and enthusiasm that energizes groups and relationships

MAY TAKE MORE CAREFUL UNPACKING

- Scattered attention — too many open loops, too many half-started projects, too many possibilities
- Avoidance of pain, limitation, and commitment that would require you to stay when things get hard
- A tendency to reframe difficulty toward the positive so quickly that real feelings don't get processed

MAY BE HARDEST TO SEE

- The most likely blind spot is the function of the mental speed itself — not just that it's fast, but that the speed is doing work. The impatience the client named ('get annoyed when people can't connect the dots as fast as I do') is almost certainly experienced as a preference for efficiency rather than as anxiety management. The question of what the speed is keeping at bay is probably outside current awareness.
- The avoidance is partially visible — the client named it — but the depth of it is probably not. 'Avoiding mean people or having to sit with tough things' frames the avoidance as a personality preference rather than a structural pattern. The layer underneath — what specifically gets avoided and why — is the more interesting territory.

- The Frustration object relations pattern (the world never quite delivers what was anticipated; the next thing always promises more than the current one) is typically the last thing a Seven recognizes about themselves. It shows up as enthusiasm for what's next and tends to be experienced as excitement rather than as a subtle background dissatisfaction.

HOW THE CLIENT APPEARS TO MOVE — THE THREE FRAMEWORK SIGNALS

These are cross-referenced patterns that showed up consistently in their responses. Each offers a different lens on the type — worth weaving in conversationally rather than introducing as categories.

SOCIAL STYLE — ASSERTIVE

- This client moves toward what they want and sets the agenda — 'never say never' is not a passive orientation. The Assertive stance means they're unlikely to wait for permission or consensus before moving.
- The impatience with others' pace is an Assertive pattern: when your default is to move, others' hesitation or slowness reads as friction. This isn't aggression — it's a structural preference for forward motion.
- In coaching, watch for the client defining the direction of the conversation before you've fully landed. That's the Assertive stance operating in real time. It's not resistance — it's just where they live.

Weave in: When something important to you isn't moving as fast as you think it should — at work, in a relationship, in a project — what do you typically do?

EMOTIONAL STYLE — POSITIVE OUTLOOK

- The Positive Outlook group manages difficulty by reframing it upward — finding what's good, what's possible, what's interesting. 'Warm, energetic, funny, optimistic' from others is a portrait of this style working well.
- The client named 'I love a good adventure' in their final response — this is the Positive Outlook orientation toward experience: difficulty is interesting, discomfort is a story you'll tell later, and staying in the good feeling is not denial, it's skill.
- The shadow of Positive Outlook is that genuine difficulty — grief, loss, sustained disappointment — can be narratively processed before it's emotionally processed. Watch for fluency about hard things that doesn't quite have the emotional weight the content deserves.

Weave in: Is there something you're working through right now that you've found a way to frame positively — but that might actually be harder than you're letting yourself feel?

ATTACHMENT STYLE — FRUSTRATION

- The Frustration pattern means the world perpetually falls slightly short of the anticipation — not because things are bad, but because the anticipation is always richer than the arrival. Sevens live in this pattern as enthusiasm for what's next.

- For this client, the drive toward new creative synthesis (building the engine, finding new connections, the 'never say never' orientation) is likely also a Frustration pattern in motion: the next project will be the one that fully satisfies.
- This is typically the least self-recognizable of the three frameworks for Sevens. Introduce it carefully — it can sound critical when it isn't. Frame it as: the gift of this pattern is that nothing ever fully dulls; the cost is that arrival is hard.

Weave in: Can you think of something you worked really hard toward — a project, a goal, a vision — and then when you got there, noticed something unexpected in how it felt?

COACHING NOTES FOR THIS SECTION

- The client has significant self-awareness and will likely engage the frameworks analytically. That's fine — but watch for the analysis itself becoming a way of staying comfortable. The question isn't whether they understand the pattern; it's whether they can feel it.
- The body probe is particularly useful here because Sevens tend to live above the neck. Bringing attention to the physical experience of the avoidance or the impatience can slow the mental processing in a useful way.
- Pacing matters: this client thinks fast and will be ready to move before you are. Name this gently if needed — 'let's stay here for a moment' is a useful phrase.

Try asking: When you notice that impatience in your body — when someone can't connect the dots as fast as you — where do you actually feel it? What happens physically?

4 · DEBRIEFING INSTINCT AND SUBTYPE

Their particular flavor of Type 7, and why it matters.

INSTINCT RANKING

One-to-One •		20 / 12
Self-Preservation		16 / 12
Social		12 / 12

SX SEVEN — THE ENTHUSIAST IN INTENSITY — HOW THE INSTINCT SHAPES THE TYPE

- The SX instinct in a Seven produces a pattern of deep, focused enthusiasm — not just interest in many things, but genuine absorption in the ones that ignite. The visionary and creative self-description fits: this is someone whose Seven energy doesn't just scan possibilities, it dives into them.
- SX Sevens are often experienced as magnetic — the warmth, humor, and connector quality others named about this client are consistent with someone whose SX instinct pulls others into shared enthusiasm. This isn't performance; it's genuine invitation.

- The project-level investment (building a complete typing engine using Claude Code) has the texture of SX focus: this wasn't a light exploration, it was a consuming creative act. SX Sevens find something that fully absorbs them and go all the way in.
- The avoidance pattern in SX Sevens tends to be relational — avoiding people or dynamics that bring them down, close things off, or introduce sustained difficulty. 'I tend to avoid mean people' is a precise SX-flavored naming of this.

WHY THIS SUBTYPE CAN BE EASY TO MISS

- SX Seven can be mistaken for SO Seven because the warmth and interpersonal connection are so prominent. The distinction is that SO Seven shares enthusiasm outward as a contribution; SX Seven shares enthusiasm because intensity needs a partner.
- SX Seven can also look like SX Six (counterphobic) because the intensity and directness can read as confrontational edge. The distinction is motivational: the Six is managing anxiety through confrontation; the Seven is pursuing intensity because it's alive.
- The 'connector' descriptor from others could suggest SO as the primary instinct. The session probe should invite the client to distinguish: Do you connect in order to contribute to a group's energy (SO), or do you connect in order to find the person who fully matches your intensity (SX)?

COACHING NOTES

- Introduce the instinct conversation by asking about energy rather than category — 'what draws you most: deep one-on-one connection, group belonging, or your own sense of security and comfort?' Let the client locate it before you name it.
- If the client lands on SO as their read, hold both lightly and name the distinction clearly. The 'connector' quality is genuinely ambiguous. This is a good place to not force resolution in a single session.
- The SX avoidance pattern — 'I avoid mean people' — is a useful entry point. Ask who specifically, and what it is about that dynamic that the client most wants to stay away from. The answer will tell you a lot about what the SX instinct is protecting.

Try asking: When you think about where your energy goes most naturally in your closest relationships — are you most drawn to finding the one person or experience that fully matches your intensity, or to being part of a larger group that you're energizing and connecting?

5 · DEBRIEFING WINGS, LINES, AND RESOURCES

What they have available, especially under pressure.

STRESS MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 1

- Under stress, Sevens move toward Type 1 — becoming critical, perfectionistic, and rigid. For this client, this would look like the expansive, possibility-generating energy collapsing into fixation on what's wrong, what's not good enough, or who isn't measuring up.
- The client confirmed the canonical stress answer. Given the impatience already named in Stage 0, the stress movement toward 1 may show up specifically as criticism of others' pace or quality — the underlying Type 1 perfectionism activating when the forward motion gets blocked.

- The coaching angle: name the stress movement as a signal rather than a failure. When the critical, rigid voice gets loud, something important is being avoided. The stress point is the system's way of forcing a stop.

Try asking: Can you think of a time when you got really critical — of yourself, of a project, of someone else — in a way that felt kind of out of character? What was happening around that?

SECURITY MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 5

- In security, Sevens move toward Type 5 — becoming quieter, more focused, and able to stay with one thing deeply. This is actually the direction of the Seven's fullest expression: the creative synthesis gifts are most powerful when paired with real depth and presence.
- The client confirmed the canonical security answer. The fact that they built this typing engine — a focused, deep, technically demanding creative project — may itself be evidence of security movement: this wasn't scattered enthusiasm, it was sustained, focused work.
- The coaching angle: the security movement toward 5 is not a loss of the Seven's vitality — it's the Seven's vitality becoming most itself. The question to plant is: what conditions make it possible for you to move that direction intentionally?

Try asking: When do you feel most genuinely at rest — not just between activities, but actually settled and present? What's different about those moments?

WINGS — TYPE 6 AND TYPE 8

- Type 7 sits between Type 6 (wing toward loyalty, responsibility, and anxiety) and Type 8 (wing toward directness, power, and confrontation). Both wings are available, and most Sevens have access to both depending on context.
- The 6 wing adds warmth, relationship investment, and a capacity for loyalty and responsibility that can soften the Seven's forward motion. The 'connector' quality and the interpersonal warmth others name suggest this wing may be active.
- The 8 wing adds directness, decisiveness, and an edge that can read as impatience or confrontation. The 'get annoyed when people can't connect the dots' quality has an 8-wing flavor — direct, no-nonsense, not inclined to wait.
- Let the client lead on wings. Ask which description lands more naturally rather than presenting a hypothesis. Many Sevens identify both wings as present in different contexts — that's not ambiguity, that's range.

Try asking: When you're at your most direct — even blunt — where does that come from? And when you're most loyal and invested in the people around you, what's happening?

6 · IF THE CONVERSATION GOES SIDEWAYS

What to do depending on how they receive the hypothesis.

IF THEY RESONATE STRONGLY

- When recognition lands cleanly — which it likely will here — move quickly from 'yes, that's me' to 'and what does it cost?' The client has already named the avoidance; your job is to help them feel the weight of it rather than just understand it.
- Strong resonance in a Seven can sometimes become its own forward motion — they understand the type, they're onto the next thing, they've synthesized it. Watch for the debrief itself getting reframed into enthusiasm. Slow it down when you see it happening.
- Use the growth moment the client already named — 'I've gotten better about it with age' — as a foothold. What specifically changed? What made the difference? That conversation is more useful than confirming what they already know.

What's the one thing about this that you'd most rather not look at?

IF THEY PUSH BACK OR DISAGREE

- If the client pushes back, do not defend the hypothesis. The most likely pushback will come from the Five signal — 'I'm much more of an introvert / depth-thinker / systems person than this sounds.' That's worth taking seriously.
- If the client lands on Five as their self-read, name the key distinction clearly and without urgency: Fives conserve and withdraw to protect a finite inner resource; Sevens expand and move to stay ahead of limitation. Both are Head center types; the question is the direction of movement.
- A second possible pushback: the avoidance description may not resonate if the client experiences themselves as someone who faces difficulty head-on in professional contexts. Acknowledge that — and then ask about the personal, not the professional.

Most likely alternate type: Type 5 — The Investigator

Key distinguishing question: The key question is: when something difficult or uncomfortable shows up, does your instinct move you inward and away to conserve and protect (Type 5), or does your mind find a way to reframe it and keep moving forward (Type 7)?

IF THEY'RE CONFUSED OR NEED MORE CLARITY

- If the client is genuinely confused — which is less likely here but possible given their system knowledge — find the foothold in Stage 0 language. 'Full of possibilities, never say never' is undeniable self-description. Start there and let the type emerge from their own words.
- If neither the idealized self-image nor the avoidance structure land, ask about the impatience specifically. The quality of the impatience — what it feels like, what it's responding to, what it wants — is highly type-specific and is often the clearest entry point for Sevens.
- Treat what doesn't fit as equally useful data. If the client says 'the avoidance part doesn't sound like me,' explore what they do with difficulty instead. The answer will almost certainly confirm or clarify the hypothesis.

Set aside the type labels for a moment — just from what you know about yourself, what's the thing you most consistently move toward, and what's the thing you most consistently move away from?
