

HIVE ENNEAGRAM REPORT PREPARED FOR SP4 SAMPLE

Type 4

The Idealist

ABOUT THE ENNEAGRAM

The Enneagram is a powerful tool for personal and professional development that describes nine distinct ways of being in the world, each anchored by a core motivation that shapes how we think, feel, and act. We have access to all nine types within us, and one of them is our home base — the pattern that has been most consistent throughout our lives.

You are not your type. Your type is a strategy you developed early on to get love, safety, and belonging, and with awareness, you can work with that pattern rather than be run by it.

You are the final authority on your Enneagram type. This report offers a hypothesis about what your type might be, based on how you answered the questions in the assessment. Type discovery is a journey, and working with a qualified coach, therapist, or other trained professional can help you get clearer on your type should you wish to go deeper.

A NOTE ON THIS RESULT

Based on your responses, the pattern that appears most consistent with your experience is Type 4 — The Idealist. We encourage you to hold this as a hypothesis or theory that you get to test 'in the wild'. That's the fun part. If it resonates, wonderful. If it doesn't fully fit, that's important information too. Debriefing this report with a trained Enneagram coach or practitioner like Cai or Monique is a great place to explore what fits, what doesn't, and why.

WHAT WE NOTICED ABOUT YOU

The phrase that stood out most in what you shared was this one: "something essential is missing in me." That's not a casual observation — it's a window into a very specific way of experiencing yourself and the world, one that shapes how you take in beauty, how you reach for authenticity, and how you feel the ache of what isn't quite there yet.

What you named as your greatest strength — emotional depth and the capacity to connect with what is real and meaningful — and what you named as your most difficult quality — envy, that persistent sense that others have something you lack — are not opposites. They are two sides of the same orientation. The same sensitivity that lets you feel things deeply is the one that registers absence so acutely.

The pattern that emerged across your responses is consistent with what the Enneagram calls Type 4 — the Individualist — a type whose inner life is organized around a longing for wholeness, authenticity, and a sense of being fully seen. Your specific responses point toward this with unusual clarity, which is itself a kind of self-knowledge worth bringing into your work.

YOUR TYPE AT A GLANCE

HOW YOU SEE THE WORLD

Fours experience the world as a place marked by what's missing — a gap between how things are and how they could or should be. They tend to feel things deeply, notice what's absent or incomplete, and search for what's authentic, meaningful, and uniquely their own.

CORE MOTIVATION

Fours are driven by a deep need to find meaning, authenticity, and a sense of wholeness — to feel their own identity fully and not be mistaken for ordinary.

Underneath this drive is an early-formed belief that something essential is missing or broken in them, and that reclaiming what's lost requires finding an experience, connection, or self-expression deep enough to complete the picture. In daily life, this shows up as strong feelings, aesthetic sensitivity, a pull toward what's distinctive or beautiful, and a recurring sense of longing for something just out of reach.

The cost, over time, is a tendency to dwell in what's absent rather than what's here — which can pull you into moods, comparison, and a quiet conviction that other people have something you don't.

In your responses: Your description of being "drawn to authenticity and beauty" and your naming of emotional depth as your core strength point toward a Type 4 motivation: the deep need to be genuine, to experience life fully, and to find or create meaning from what is felt most intensely. The envy you named so directly — "a persistent sense that others have something I lack" — aligns with one of Type 4's most central and least comfortable patterns: an attention that instinctively scans for what is missing, unavailable, or just out of reach, and compares inward against what others seem to possess. This isn't a character flaw; it's a habit of attention that has a logic and a cost. The phrase "something essential is missing in me" is consistent with what Type 4s often describe as the felt experience underneath everything else — a sense of deficiency that can be hard to locate and harder still to shake, even when life is going well.

PATTERNS OF THINKING, FEELING, AND BEHAVING

Your core motivation doesn't just live in the background — it expresses itself as recognizable patterns of thinking, feeling, and behaving that show up consistently across different areas of your life.

THINKING PATTERNS OF A TYPE 4 — THE IDEALIST

Attention goes first to what's missing, what's felt, or what's unique and meaningful about an experience. The mind often moves through comparison — how this is better or worse, how you measure up, what's different about your inner life.

There's a pull toward the ideal, the aesthetic, and the authentic, and an intolerance for the bland or generic. Over time, this can produce a kind of gravitational drift toward what isn't here — even when what is here is genuinely good.

FEELING PATTERNS OF A TYPE 4 — THE IDEALIST

Fours feel intensely and often, with a full spectrum that includes sadness, longing, melancholy, beauty, and fierce love. Feelings are identity-adjacent — they tell you who you are and what matters.

The shadow is over-identifying with whatever mood arrives, as if it were the whole truth, and a tendency to amplify emotional intensity because numbness or ordinariness feels worse than pain. Envy — comparing your inner life to others' apparent ease — is often the dominant undercurrent, though it may surface as criticism, longing, or private grief rather than obvious jealousy.

BEHAVIOR PATTERNS OF A TYPE 4 — THE IDEALIST

Fours often withdraw inward, especially when emotions are strong. Behavior tends to be expressive — through creativity, aesthetic choices, personal style, or the way you inhabit your space and relationships.

You may alternate between pulling toward people in intensity and pulling away in self-protection or melancholy. The shadow is inconsistency — commitments made in the heat of feeling that are hard to sustain when the mood shifts, and a reluctance to do ordinary things that might feel like betrayal of something deeper.

These patterns give rise to a distinctive set of strengths and challenges. The ones below are characteristic of Type 4 — you may recognize some more than others, and that recognition itself is useful information.

STRENGTHS

- + Deep emotional sensitivity and the ability to feel and express what others can't or won't
- + Creativity, aesthetic awareness, and a gift for finding meaning in experience
- + Real empathy, especially with suffering — the ability to stay with difficult feelings rather than rushing past them

CHALLENGES

- Dwelling in what's missing, which can pull you away from the good that is already present
- Intense moods and a tendency to identify strongly with whatever you're feeling in the moment
- Comparison with others that produces either envy or a sense of your own inadequacy

DEVELOPMENT TIPS

These practices can help you leverage your strengths and address the patterns that can hold you back.

1. When longing pulls your attention toward what's missing, practice shifting to what's actually here. Gratitude is a muscle, and Fours benefit from building it deliberately.
2. Stay consistent with commitments, even when the feelings don't match. Feelings are real information, but they're not always accurate instructions about what to do next.
3. Notice when self-absorption pulls you inward at the expense of being present with others. The inward journey is valuable; getting stuck there is costly.
4. Recognize that suffering, specialness, and feeling different can become addictive substitutes for the ordinary connection and belonging that would actually heal the original wound.

5. Let yourself be loved in your ordinariness. You don't have to be unique to be worthy of connection. The longing for something extraordinary often masks the possibility of something real, right where you are.

ABOUT THE INSTINCTS

Alongside your core type, you have a dominant instinct — one of three innate drives that shape where your survival energy goes first. The three instincts are Self-Preservation (SP), focused on safety, comfort, health, and the practical resources of daily life; One-to-One (SX), focused on deep, intense connection with specific people or experiences; and Social (SO), focused on belonging, group dynamics, and your place within a community.

All three instincts are present in everyone, but one instinct tends to run the show. Understanding your dominant instinct helps explain why two people of the same type can look quite different in practice — the instinct flavors how the core pattern shows up in your life.

YOUR INSTINCT — SELF-PRESERVATION

Self-Preservation Fours are the counter-type — rather than expressing their suffering outwardly, they quietly endure it and push forward. There's a dauntless, sometimes reckless quality here, a willingness to take risks and throw themselves into new situations.

They often look more resilient and less obviously moody than other Fours, which can make the core longing harder to spot. The work is still there underneath — a drive to earn what's missing rather than mourn it.

In your responses: Your dominant instinct appears to be Self-Preservation — and for a Type 4, this combination produces a presentation that can look quite different from the emotionally expressive Four many people expect. SP Fours tend to carry their depth more quietly: they are often stoic about their own suffering, self-sufficient in difficult moments, and driven by a private tenacity rather than an outward display of feeling. This may help explain why others describe you as "very genuine and committed" alongside "intense" — the SP Four's depth is real but often held inward, expressed through dedication and presence rather than emotional display. The struggle you named — the sense of something missing, the envy — is likely experienced as a largely internal current rather than something easily visible to others.

HOW YOUR TYPE MOVES THROUGH STRESS AND EASE

The Enneagram is not a static map — it describes movement. Each type has two resource points on the diagram: a stress point and a security point. These are the Enneagram types your energy moves toward when you're under significant pressure or when you're feeling "in flow", safe and supported.

This movement happens at an unconscious level. You don't decide to shift toward your stress point Enneagram type — it happens automatically, driven by the same survival instincts that shaped your core pattern in the first place. Under enough pressure, you may find yourself thinking, feeling, and behaving in ways that feel uncharacteristic — more anxious, more withdrawn, more reactive — without quite knowing why. That's movement towards the stress point Enneagram type.

The same is true in the other direction. When you feel secure, resourced, and at ease, your energy moves toward your security point Enneagram type, and you gain access to qualities that don't come as naturally from your “home base” type. You may find yourself more purposeful, more open, more willing to take up space — a version of yourself that feels both unfamiliar and right.

What makes this valuable is awareness. Once you recognize these movements — in yourself, in the moment — you are no longer simply subject to them. Becoming aware of your movement to the less resourced side of your stress point is a wake-up call to pause and take care of yourself. As you develop yourself, you can access the more useful qualities of both your stress and security points intentionally, rather than waiting for circumstances to push or pull you there. The stress point, which often shows up as a less resourced version of yourself under pressure, also contains real capacities worth cultivating. The security point is not a destination you only reach when everything is going well — its higher qualities are available to you right here, right now, as a valuable resource. Finally, if you notice yourself behaving like the lower side of your security point, that is a sign that you are very stressed indeed, and need to take a pause.

UNDER STRESS

Under significant stress, Type 4s can move toward Type 2's territory — becoming more focused on seeking validation and attention from others, more emotionally expressive in ways that feel urgent or needy, and more dependent on reassurance than usual. You recognized this pattern in yourself, which suggests some existing self-awareness around it.

Knowing this pattern exists is useful because it often arrives quietly — the need for connection and recognition builds before it becomes visible, and by the time it's obvious it can already be driving behavior. Noticing the early signals — the pull toward seeking someone's response, the heightened emotional expression — gives you a choice point earlier in the process.

WHEN AT EASE

When Type 4s feel genuinely safe and supported, they can access some of Type 1's most grounded qualities: increased discipline, the ability to act with principled focus, and a capacity to set aside personal feeling in service of something larger. You recognized this movement clearly, which points to real access to this resource.

This is meaningful because it means that groundedness, structure, and objectivity aren't foreign to you — they're already available in the right conditions. Part of the growth work for Type 4 often involves learning to access those Type 1 qualities not only when safety is already present, but as a practice that can itself create the conditions for more security.

WING INFLUENCE

ABOUT WINGS

Wings are the two types adjacent to your core type on the Enneagram. They act as neighbors — not changing who you are, but flavoring how your core type shows up. Most people lean toward one wing more than the other, though some experience both equally and some don't notice much wing influence at all.

Your wing doesn't replace your core motivation; it adds texture, giving you access to qualities from an adjacent type that can both support and complicate your core pattern.

THREE WING — TYPE 3

A Four with a strong Three wing is more outgoing, more accomplished-looking, and more engaged with the external world. The Three wing brings drive, energy, and a capacity to translate inner intensity into visible achievement — often in creative or artistic fields.

The tradeoff is tension between authentic self-expression and the pull to be seen and successful, which can feel contradictory. At their best, Fours with a Three wing are expressive and effective — people who bring their depth into the world rather than keeping it private.

FIVE WING — TYPE 5

A Four with a strong Five wing is more introspective, more private, and more intellectually focused. The Five wing brings depth of analysis, a love of ideas, and a tendency to withdraw inward to think and feel in solitude.

The tradeoff is isolation — the combination of Four's longing and Five's withdrawal can produce real loneliness, especially if they don't share their rich inner world. At their best, Fours with a Five wing are deeply creative and contemplative — people whose inner life is unusually rich and whose perception is distinctive and sharp.

SECONDARY TYPE HYPOTHESIS

Type 1 emerged as a meaningful secondary signal throughout your responses — not as a competing type, but as a pattern worth naming. When Type 4s feel genuinely safe and resourced, they often move toward Type 1's qualities: greater discipline, objectivity, and the capacity to act with principled focus rather than being driven by personal feeling.

Some of what surfaced in your responses — an orientation toward what is right and correct, a quality of internal self-monitoring — may reflect this access to Type 1 territory rather than a separate type altogether. The SP Four and Type 1 can look strikingly similar from the outside: both are self-critical, internally focused, and organized around a felt gap between who they are and some internalized standard.

The distinguishing question — one that may be worth sitting with — is this: is the inner critic in you most concerned with correcting and improving toward a principle of rightness, or most concerned with what feels missing, incomplete, or not fully itself? That distinction tends to clarify things.

WHAT TO EXPLORE WITH YOUR ENNEAGRAM COACH OR PRACTITIONER

These questions are designed to help you get the most out of your work with a coach or practitioner. Take a moment to sit with each one before your session.

1. At the center of the Type 4 pattern is a longing — for wholeness, for something that feels genuinely one's own, for a sense of being fully and authentically present without the undertow of what's missing. Where do you feel that longing most in your life right now? And what feels most alive for you to explore with your coach as you begin this work?

2. Think of a specific challenge or relationship you're navigating right now — something that's genuinely difficult or uncertain. As you hold that situation in mind, notice: where does your attention go first? Is it toward what's working, or toward what's absent, incomplete, or not quite right? And is that pattern helping you, getting in the way, or somehow doing both at once?
3. Some of Type 4's greatest strengths include emotional depth, authenticity, a capacity for genuine connection, and the ability to find meaning in difficult experience. Some of the patterns that can get in the way include envy, a tendency to dwell in what's missing, and withdrawing when the longing becomes too acute. Looking at both sides — which strength would you most like to bring more of, and which pattern feels most important to work with? What makes you choose those two?

Generated by the Hive Enneagram Type Hypothesizer · © Copyright 2026, Hive, Inc. All rights reserved.