SP Nine — The Self-Preservation Peacemaker

MEDIUM-HIGH CONFIDENCE

This report is designed as a session prep tool — organized around the debrief conversation you'll have with your client, not around how the assessment engine arrived at its hypothesis. Read Section 1 for the quick read. Use Sections 2 through 5 as a companion during the debrief itself. Section 6 offers contingency guidance depending on how the conversation unfolds.

1 • YOUR READ ON THIS CLIENT

PRIMARY HYPOTHESIS	Type 9 — The Peacemaker
DOMINANT INSTINCT	Self-Preservation (SP)
CONFIDENCE	MEDIUM-HIGH
ALTERNATE TO HOLD LIGHTLY	Type 8 — The Protector
COUNTER-TYPE	Not flagged

THE READ

This client gave some of the cleanest Type 9 Stage 0 language you're likely to see in this format. 'Easygoing, patient, calm, steady, agreeable' — five words that are not just consistent with Nine, they read like a Nine's idealized self-portrait rendered without self-consciousness. What's particularly useful is that the self-identified problematic quality — 'I avoid conflict and can neglect my own priorities' — isn't hedged or rationalized; they said it plainly, which suggests a level of self-awareness that the coaching conversation can build on rather than having to excavate. The SP instinct is HIGH confidence and fits: 'calm and steady' and 'neglect my own priorities' both point to someone whose peace-seeking is organized around the personal comfort domain rather than the relational or intensity domains. One thing worth holding lightly going in: Type 8 never fully dropped away — it carried as a live alternative through Stage 3 and Stage 4, with all three Stage 4 checks showing only a slight lean rather than a decisive break. The Body center scored a perfect 18/18. This is almost certainly a Nine — but it may be a Nine with significant Eight energy, and the coaching conversation should leave room for that.

GOING IN

- Confidence is MEDIUM_HIGH — the Stage 0 language is exceptionally clean, Center confidence is HIGH, and Stage 4 was CONFIRMED. The moderating factor is that all Stage 4 checks were 'slight lean,' not decisive, and the Object Relations result (Rejection) was anomalous for Type 9.
- This client is likely to recognize the Nine description quickly and warmly — the self-description is already Nine-fluent. Watch for over-acceptance: Nines can nod along to almost any type description because they're practiced at finding something to agree with. Push for specificity, not just resonance.
- The 'neglect my own priorities' self-disclosure is a gift — it's an opening straight into the Nine's core wound around self-erasure. Don't rush past it. That sentence is likely to be the most productive thread in the whole conversation.
- Hold the Type 8 second candidate lightly. If the client pushes back on Nine or describes moments of unexpected forcefulness or suppressed anger breaking through, sit with Eight briefly before moving on. The distinguishing question is Hornevian: does the client feel more pulled toward withdrawal and merging, or toward assertion and impact?
- The Object Relations Rejection result is the one anomaly — it may reflect the SP Nine's pattern of pre-emptive withdrawal before rejection can land, or it may be a residual Eight signal. Either way, worth a gentle probe in Section 3.

2 • DEBRIEFING CORE MOTIVATION AND WORLDVIEW

How to present the heart of the type and connect it to their own words.

THE CORE PATTERN

- The Nine's core motivation is the avoidance of conflict and fragmentation — both internal and external. The deepest drive is not laziness or passivity but a profound need to maintain an inner sense of wholeness and okayness, often experienced as 'everything is fine, nothing is broken.' Disruption — especially interpersonal disruption — registers as a threat to that internal equilibrium.
- The Nine's worldview runs something like: 'My presence and my needs are less important than the peace of the whole. If I assert myself, I risk disrupting what holds everything together — and that loss is worse than the cost of staying small.' This is not a conscious belief; it's a felt sense that operates below the waterline.
- Self-forgetting is the Nine's characteristic pattern — not self-sacrifice in the Two sense (which carries an expectation of return), but a genuine blurring of the self into the background. Nines can lose track of their own preferences, priorities, and even their own anger with surprising thoroughness.
- The Nine's strength and their shadow are the same coin: the capacity to hold multiple perspectives without needing to collapse them is genuinely valuable — and it's also what makes it hard to take their own side, assert their own position, or insist on their own place in the room.

WHAT THEIR RESPONSES SHOWED

- 'Easygoing, patient, calm, steady, agreeable' — this isn't just a personality description, it's a Nine's idealized self rendered in five words. Every term points toward a self-image organized around smoothness, non-disruption, and harmonious presence.
- 'Staying calm and seeing all sides of a situation' as the greatest strength is classically Nine: the mediating capacity, the ability to hold complexity without needing a winner. Notice that the strength is defined relationally — it's about managing the field, not about what they produce or achieve.
- 'I avoid conflict and can neglect my own priorities' — this is the Nine shadow stated with unusual directness. Most Nines need several sessions before they articulate this so plainly. It's a strong opening.
- 'Sometimes too passive' from others' description — not 'too quiet' or 'too accommodating,' but passive. That word carries weight: it suggests others experience the client's peace-orientation as a kind of absence or withdrawal, which aligns with the Nine's Withdrawn Hornebian stance.

COACHING NOTES

- Start with the strength — 'staying calm and seeing all sides' — before moving into the shadow. Nines need to feel met before they'll engage with the harder material. Affirm the genuine value of their gift before naming its cost.
- When you get to 'neglect my own priorities,' don't let it pass as a known limitation. Ask them to make it specific and recent. The move from abstract self-awareness to embodied recognition is where the real work happens.
- Watch for the Nine's characteristic response to being typed: warm agreement, nodding, 'yes, that resonates' — without anything sticking. The question to keep returning to is: 'Where do you feel this in your actual life, right now?' Not in general. Specifically.

Try asking: 'When you say you neglect your own priorities — can you think of a specific moment in the last few weeks when that happened? What was going on, and what did you do instead of what you actually wanted to do?'

3 · DEBRIEFING PATTERNS OF THINKING, FEELING, AND BEHAVING

What to expect and what to watch for as you walk through type patterns.

CENTERS OF INTELLIGENCE

Body Center •

18 / 18

Heart Center

12 / 18

LIKELY TO RESONATE EASILY

- A natural ability to create calm and safety in environments and relationships
- Genuine empathy and the capacity to hold multiple perspectives without judgment
- A grounded, steady presence that others instinctively trust and find reassuring

MAY TAKE MORE CAREFUL UNPACKING

- Self-forgetting — losing touch with your own priorities, desires, and voice in the process of accommodating others
- Inertia — difficulty initiating action, especially on your own behalf, leading to procrastination or passive drift
- Conflict avoidance — a tendency to go along or stay quiet rather than assert a position, even when your perspective matters deeply

MAY BE HARDEST TO SEE

- The Nine's anger is the thing most likely to be completely outside this client's current awareness. Nines are a Body center type whose relationship to anger is one of dissipation and narcotization — they don't typically experience themselves as angry, even when anger is precisely what would be appropriate. The client's own language ('calm, patient, easygoing') is the Nine's idealization of a self that has successfully managed to not feel the anger. The question is what it costs.
- Self-erasure as an active pattern — not a passive failing — is likely to be hard to see. 'I neglect my own priorities' reads as self-awareness, but the deeper question is whether the client recognizes that this neglect is doing something, not just failing to do something. There's a subtle but important difference between 'I forgot myself' and 'I moved myself out of the way.'
- The Object Relations Rejection result is anomalous and worth exploring. If this client has a learned pattern of withdrawing before others can reject or dismiss them — pre-emptive self-erasure as protection — that would explain both the Rejection result and the Nine pattern, and it would point toward a deeper wound than simple conflict-avoidance.

HOW THE CLIENT APPEARS TO MOVE — THE THREE FRAMEWORK SIGNALS

These are cross-referenced patterns that showed up consistently in their responses. Each offers a different lens on the type — worth weaving in conversationally rather than introducing as categories.

SOCIAL STYLE — WITHDRAWING

- This client moves away from others to manage internal equilibrium — not through intellectual detachment (5) or emotional retreat (4) but through a kind of blending and disappearing. 'Easy to be around' is the gift of this stance: the client doesn't press, doesn't demand, doesn't create friction.

- The Withdrawn stance for Nines means that when conflict arises, the first instinct is to soften, smooth, or absent oneself from the disruption — not to confront it (8) or to comply with it (1, 2, 6). 'I avoid conflict' is Withdrawn, not just agreeable.
- The risk of the Withdrawn stance for this client is that their own needs and priorities become increasingly invisible — to themselves as much as to others. 'Sometimes too passive' is others noticing the Withdrawn pattern from the outside.

Weave in: 'When things get tense or conflicted in your world — at work, at home, anywhere — what do you actually do? Do you notice yourself pulling back, trying to smooth it over, or something else?'

EMOTIONAL STYLE — POSITIVE

- The Positive Outlook harmonic means this client tends to minimize difficulty, reframe discomfort, and maintain a forward-facing sense that things are fundamentally okay. This isn't denial exactly — it's a deep structural preference for okayness over disruption.
- For Nines specifically, the Positive Outlook shows up as a kind of ambient reassurance: 'It's fine, I'm fine, we're fine.' The client's 'calm and steady' self-description is consistent with someone who has practiced this reassurance so thoroughly it feels like their natural state.
- The coaching edge here is that Positive Outlook can become a way of not staying with difficulty long enough for it to become useful. 'Staying calm and seeing all sides' is a strength — but it can also be a way of never quite landing on one's own experience of a situation.

Weave in: 'Is there anything in your life right now that you've been telling yourself is fine — or that you've been managing to stay calm about — but that maybe deserves more of your attention or frustration than you've been giving it?'

ATTACHMENT STYLE — REJECTION

- This is the anomalous result — Type 9 standardly sits in the Attachment triad, not Rejection. The Rejection result (shared with Types 2, 5, and 8) suggests the client may have a learned pattern of withdrawing before they can be dismissed or pushed aside — pre-emptive self-erasure as a form of self-protection.
- If this is accurate, it would mean the 'neglect my own priorities' pattern isn't just Nine self-forgetting but also contains a protective logic: if I don't put my needs forward, they can't be refused. This is worth sitting with gently — it doesn't change the type hypothesis, but it may add depth to the wound.

- The Type 8 second candidate also lives in the Rejection triad, which makes this result consistent with the residual Eight signal. The coach should listen for any language around not wanting to be dismissed, overlooked, or rendered unimportant — that's the Rejection theme regardless of type.

Weave in: 'When you hold back from asserting your own needs or priorities — is there ever a sense underneath it of not wanting to be turned down, or not wanting to be seen as too much? Or does it feel more like your needs just... aren't that important?'

COACHING NOTES FOR THIS SECTION

- Move slowly through the framework signals. Nines can agree with the description of all three frameworks without any of them actually landing — the Positive Outlook harmonic is working in real time during the debrief.
- The Rejection result is the most clinically interesting anomaly. Handle it carefully — don't lead with it, but if the conversation opens up toward the wound underneath the conflict avoidance, it's worth a gentle probe.
- Watch for explanation as a deflection. If the client starts offering reasons why they're this way — family context, work demands, etc. — gently redirect: 'I hear that context. I'm more curious about what it feels like from the inside, right now.'

Try asking: 'If you imagined putting yourself — your actual priorities, your actual preferences — into the center of a room, and asking everyone to organize around them... what comes up in your body when you picture that?'

4 • DEBRIEFING INSTINCT AND SUBTYPE

Their particular flavor of Type 9, and why it matters.

INSTINCT RANKING

Self-Preservation •		12 / 12
Social		8 / 12
One-to-One		4 / 12

SP NINE — THE SELF-PRESERVATION PEACEMAKER — HOW THE INSTINCT SHAPES THE TYPE

- The SP Nine's peace-seeking is organized around the personal domain — comfort, routine, the security of familiar environments and predictable rhythms. Where SO Nines merge into groups and SX Nines merge into relationships, SP Nines find their okayness in the stability of their immediate surroundings and small reliable pleasures.

- 'Calm and steady' as a self-description is particularly SP Nine: there's a quality of being settled in one's physical space and daily rhythms that SP Nines mistake for groundedness, when it can also be a sophisticated form of numbing. The comfort of the known is both a genuine resource and a place to hide.
- 'Neglecting my own priorities' in an SP Nine often shows up not as dramatic self-sacrifice but as a slow gravitational drift — the day fills up with comfortable routines and small tasks that feel manageable, and the things that would require assertion or disruption simply don't get done.
- SP Nines can look like Ones — reliable, hardworking, organized — because their peace-seeking has a practical, grounded quality. The distinguishing question is motivation: the One is driven by a standard of correctness; the SP Nine is driven by the need to keep the environment stable and the inner world undisturbed.

WHY THIS SUBTYPE CAN BE EASY TO MISS

- SP Nines can be misread as highly functional and self-sufficient — even grounded and stable — when underneath there is a significant pattern of avoiding the disruption that growth would require. 'Reliable, supportive, easy to be around' describes someone who looks like they have it together.
- The SP instinct can make the Nine's self-forgetting look like preference rather than pattern. 'I'm just a homebody,' 'I prefer simple things,' 'I don't need much' — these can all be genuine, and they can also be the SP Nine's relationship with numbness dressed up as contentment.
- Because the SP Nine's peace-seeking is in the personal domain rather than the interpersonal domain, it can fly under the radar in group or work settings. They may function well, produce reliably, and not appear in conflict — and still be quietly erasing themselves from the picture.
- The residual Eight signal in this client's data may make them seem more assertive or grounded than a typical Nine, which could lead an interviewer to dismiss the Nine hypothesis. The key is to probe for what happens to their energy when things get genuinely disrupted.

COACHING NOTES

- Introduce the SP Nine framing after the type itself has landed. Let them recognize themselves in the Nine first, then add: 'There's a particular flavor of Nine that organizes around the personal environment — comfort, routine, stability. Does that feel closer to your experience than, say, merging into relationships or groups?'
- The comfort-vs-numbing distinction is the most useful coaching edge for SP Nines. Not 'you're numbing yourself' — that lands as a judgment — but 'I'm curious about the difference between genuine rest and using comfort as a way of not having to feel what's underneath.'
- Ask about the small things — the routines, the rituals, the ways they maintain their personal space. That's where the SP Nine's pattern is most alive and most specific.

Try asking: 'What does a typical day look like for you? Not the big picture — the actual texture of it, the rhythms, the small things you reach for. And when something disrupts those rhythms, what happens?'

5 • DEBRIEFING WINGS, LINES, AND RESOURCES

What they have available, especially under pressure.

STRESS MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 6

- Under stress, Nines move toward Type 6 — from calm and steady into anxious, doubtful, and hypervigilant. For this client, this would likely look like a sudden loss of the characteristic steadiness, replaced by second-guessing, worry, and a reaching for reassurance or certainty.
- The client's Stage 4 stress answer was a slight lean toward Nine's stress point — not a decisive break. This may mean they haven't fully mapped this territory yet, or that the stress movement is subtle enough that it hasn't been clearly named. The coach should probe gently: 'When things feel really overwhelming — not just busy, but genuinely out of control — what happens to your usual calm?'
- The coaching angle here is recognition, not intervention. Most Nines in stress don't know that their anxiety is a stress response rather than a new personality trait. Naming the movement as temporary and type-specific can be genuinely relieving.

Try asking: 'Can you think of a time when your usual calm completely disappeared — when you found yourself worrying, second-guessing, maybe even catastrophizing? What was going on, and what did that feel like from the inside?'

SECURITY MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 3

- In security, Nines move toward Type 3 — from self-effacing and still into purposeful, engaged, and genuinely self-directed. For SP Nines this is often particularly striking because the movement into 3 energy involves not just doing more but actually wanting things for themselves.
- The client's Stage 4 security answer was a slight lean toward Nine's security point — again, not decisive. For SP Nines, the 9-to-3 security pathway can be underutilized precisely because comfort and routine feel like enough. The growth edge is learning to tolerate the ambition and self-assertion that the 3 access point requires.
- Frame the security movement positively: 'There's a version of you that has clear direction, claims your own goals, and moves toward them without apology. That's actually available to you — it shows up when you feel genuinely safe and supported. What would it take to create more of those conditions?'

Try asking: 'Think of a time when you were really in your element — focused, energized, moving toward something that actually mattered to you. What was different about that situation? What had to be true for you to show up that way?'

WINGS — TYPE 8 AND TYPE 1

- The Nine has two wings: the Eight wing (9w8) and the One wing (9w1). Both are Body center types, which means neither wing takes the Nine out of their instinctual domain — but they shape it very differently.
- The 9w8 — sometimes called 'The Referee' — brings groundedness, confidence, and a quiet assertiveness. Nines with an Eight wing are often harder to push around, more likely to stand their ground without drama, and more comfortable in leadership. Given the residual Eight signal throughout this assessment, 9w8 is the more likely wing for this client.
- The 9w1 — sometimes called 'The Dreamer' — brings idealism, conscientiousness, and an inner critic that can be quietly harsh. Nines with a One wing are often more internally principled and more self-judging, with a stronger sense of what should be.
- Let the client lead on wings — don't assign one. Ask which description resonates more, and listen for language about either quiet assertiveness (8 wing) or internal standards and self-judgment (1 wing).

Try asking: 'Do you find yourself more drawn to the idea of standing your ground and having quiet confidence when you need it — or more drawn to having a strong sense of what's right and holding yourself to a standard? Which feels more like you?'

6 • IF THE CONVERSATION GOES SIDEWAYS

What to do depending on how they receive the hypothesis.

IF THEY RESONATE STRONGLY

- When the client strongly agrees, affirm the recognition briefly — then move immediately toward specificity. 'I'm glad that resonates — I want to make sure we're talking about your actual experience and not just a description that sounds right. Can you show me where this lives in your life right now?'
- Watch for the Nine's tendency to recognize themselves warmly in a type description without anything sticking. Recognition without embodiment is pleasant but not transformative. The work is to move from 'yes, that's me' to 'and here's where I actually feel it in my body, in my choices, in what I'm not doing.'
- If resonance is very strong, invite the client to name the thing they most want to change or develop. Nines can stay comfortable in self-understanding. The goal is to make the self-understanding uncomfortable enough to motivate movement.

When you hear all of this and it resonates — what's the one thing that lands hardest? Not just the most true, but the most uncomfortable to look at?

IF THEY PUSH BACK OR DISAGREE

- If the client pushes back on Type 9, do not defend the hypothesis. Thank them for the pushback and get curious: 'That's useful — tell me more about what doesn't fit.' Listen specifically for what they're pushing back toward.
- The most likely alternate type given this data is Type 8. If the client says 'I'm not that passive' or 'I actually do speak up,' probe whether that assertiveness is native and comfortable or whether it comes with a cost. Eights assert without residue; Nines often feel drained or uncomfortable after doing so.
- If the client is drawn toward Type 1, listen for whether the concern is with correctness and internal standards versus comfort and peace. Ones are driven by a sense of what's right; Nines are driven by a sense of okayness. These can look similar from the outside but feel very different from the inside.
- Hold the hypothesis lightly and name it explicitly: 'We're working with a hypothesis here, not a conclusion. If this doesn't fit, that's important information. Let's find the type that actually explains your experience, not just the one that sounds most like you.'

Most likely alternate type: Type 8 — The Challenger

Key distinguishing question: The key question is: when you assert yourself or hold your ground, does it feel natural and cost-free — even energizing — or does it feel like something you do despite a pull toward keeping the peace?

IF THEY'RE CONFUSED OR NEED MORE CLARITY

- If the client is genuinely confused, find the foothold — usually the Stage 0 language. 'You used the word easygoing to describe yourself. Can you tell me more about what that means to you in practice? Not the concept — the actual lived experience of it.' Start there.
- Treat what doesn't fit as equally useful data. 'Let's look at the parts that don't resonate — those are often the most interesting. What feels off, and what would have to be true for that part to fit?'
- Confusion in a Nine is often not confusion at all — it's the Nine's characteristic difficulty locating themselves clearly enough to confirm or deny. The work isn't to resolve the confusion faster; it's to stay with the client in the not-knowing long enough for something specific to surface.

Try asking: 'Set aside the type descriptions for a moment. Just from your own experience — what do you think is the thing you most consistently move away from? What is the thing your whole system is organized to avoid?'
