SP Nine — The Self-Preservation Peacemaker

HIGH CONFIDENCE

This report is designed as a session prep tool — organized around the debrief conversation you'll have with your client, not around how the assessment engine arrived at its hypothesis. Read Section 1 for the quick read. Use Sections 2 through 5 as a companion during the debrief itself. Section 6 offers contingency guidance depending on how the conversation unfolds.

1 • YOUR READ ON THIS CLIENT

PRIMARY HYPOTHESISType 9 — The Peacemaker*DOMINANT INSTINCT*Self-Preservation (SP)*CONFIDENCE*HIGH*ALTERNATE TO HOLD LIGHTLY*Type 2 — The Giver*COUNTER-TYPE*Not flagged

THE READ

This client presents as a clean, well-integrated Type 9 with Self-Preservation instinct, and the data is unusually coherent across all five stages. What stands out is not the scoring — it's the quality of self-awareness already present in the Stage 0 language. 'I lose my own momentum; I forget what I actually want' is not a typical Nine response; most Nines struggle to name the self-forgetting directly because the pattern operates below awareness. This client has touched the wound. That's a significant entry point for coaching. The SP coloring shows up in the emphasis on steadiness, groundedness, and stability — this is a Nine whose peace is enacted through reliable structure rather than through social harmony. Others' report of 'sometimes stubborn' and 'hard to read' are both classic SP Nine markers worth exploring in session.

GOING IN

- Confidence is HIGH across all stages — Stage 1, Stage 2, Stage 3, and Stage 4 all confirm Type 9 cleanly. Present this hypothesis with confidence while maintaining invitational language.
- The client's named shadow ('I forget what I actually want') is an unusually direct articulation of the Nine's core wound. They may be quite ready to engage at depth — don't underestimate how far this session could go.

- Type 2 was the live alternative through Stage 2 and resolved cleanly at Stage 3. The client's warmth and 'kind' descriptor from others may surface as a potential Type 2 resonance — be ready to name the motivational distinction if needed.
- The SP instinct is confirmed at HIGH confidence. Frame the debrief around stability, routine, and physical/environmental groundedness rather than social harmony — that's where this Nine's peace-seeking lives.
- No counter-type flag, no redirect, no flags of any kind. This is a clean result — your primary task is depth of exploration, not disambiguation.

2 • DEBRIEFING CORE MOTIVATION AND WORLDVIEW

How to present the heart of the type and connect it to their own words.

THE CORE PATTERN

- The Nine's core motivation is inner peace — specifically, the avoidance of whatever would disrupt that peace, including conflict, but crucially including their own desires and agenda when those feel threatening to harmony. The Nine doesn't simply want quiet; they want the felt sense of being undisturbed.
- The Nine achieves this peace partly through merging — absorbing others' agendas, preferences, and energy until their own become unclear or invisible. This is not a choice; it's a structural tendency. The self-forgetting happens automatically, below conscious awareness, which is why this client's direct naming of it is notable.
- The Nine's deepest fear is fragmentation — loss of connection, conflict that ruptures relationship, or the inner turbulence that comes from asserting wants that might be unwelcome. The go-with-the-flow orientation is a structural defense against that feared disruption.
- The Nine's idealized self-image is as the harmonizer, the stable one, the person who keeps things grounded — exactly how this client described themselves. The gap between that self-image and the shadow ('I forget what I actually want') is the terrain of the coaching work.

WHAT THEIR RESPONSES SHOWED

- 'Peaceful, easygoing, go-with-the-flow, steady calming presence' — this is the Nine's self-concept stated almost verbatim. The idealization of harmony and ease is fully present and conscious.
- 'Stability and presence — I keep things grounded' as greatest strength confirms the Nine's genuine gift and the way they orient their identity around being the anchor for others.
- 'I lose my own momentum; I forget what I actually want' — this is the Nine's core wound stated with unusual directness. The word 'forget' is particularly diagnostic: it's not suppression or avoidance, it's the Nine's characteristic dissolution of self.
- Others' description includes 'hard to read' and 'sometimes stubborn' — both SP Nine markers. 'Hard to read' reflects the Nine's inner opacity (to themselves and others); 'sometimes stubborn' reflects the quiet rigidity that emerges when SP structure is threatened.

COACHING NOTES

- Open with the strength — 'stability and presence' — before moving to the shadow. This client has named their wound directly, but that doesn't mean they're ready to lead with it. Let the recognition of the gift land first.
- When you get to 'I forget what I actually want,' slow down. Ask them to locate a specific recent example rather than working abstractly. The Nine's self-forgetting is easier to see in concrete situations than in the general.
- Watch for the Nine pattern showing up in the session itself — merging with your framing, agreeing readily, deflecting from their own experience toward yours. Gently name it when it happens; it's live data.

Try asking: 'When you said you forget what you actually want — can you think of a recent moment where that happened? What was going on, and what did you do instead?'

3 · DEBRIEFING PATTERNS OF THINKING, FEELING, AND BEHAVING

What to expect and what to watch for as you walk through type patterns.

CENTERS OF INTELLIGENCE

Body Center		0 / 18
Heart Center		0 / 18
Head Center		0 / 18

LIKELY TO RESONATE EASILY

- A natural ability to create calm and safety in environments and relationships
- Genuine empathy and the capacity to hold multiple perspectives without judgment
- A grounded, steady presence that others instinctively trust and find reassuring

MAY TAKE MORE CAREFUL UNPACKING

- Self-forgetting — losing touch with your own priorities, desires, and voice in the process of accommodating others
- Inertia — difficulty initiating action, especially on your own behalf, leading to procrastination or passive drift
- Conflict avoidance — a tendency to go along or stay quiet rather than assert a position, even when your perspective matters deeply

MAY BE HARDEST TO SEE

- The most invisible pattern for this client is likely the anger that underlies the go-with-the-flow orientation. Nines are Body center types whose anger is dissipated rather than expressed or converted — it doesn't feel like anger from the inside. What gets noticed instead is inertia, stubbornness, or the vague sense of having lost momentum. The 'sometimes stubborn' from others is probably the closest this client comes to owning it.
- The self-forgetting itself, while named, may not yet be fully felt as a loss. The client describes it as a problematic quality, but Nines often frame their self-forgetting in practical terms ('I lose my momentum') rather than emotional terms ('I grieve not knowing what I want'). The emotional weight of the forgetting — what it costs — may be largely outside awareness.

- The way peace-keeping functions as avoidance is likely not yet in view. The client experiences themselves as genuinely easy-going and peaceful — they may not yet see the extent to which that ease is maintained by not attending to certain things, including their own interior life.

HOW THE CLIENT APPEARS TO MOVE — THE THREE FRAMEWORK SIGNALS

These are cross-referenced patterns that showed up consistently in their responses. Each offers a different lens on the type — worth weaving in conversationally rather than introducing as categories.

SOCIAL STYLE — WITHDRAWN

- The Withdrawn stance means this client moves away from others to resource themselves — they regulate through stepping back, finding their own space, rather than through engaging outward (Assertive) or adapting to others (Compliant).
- For this SP Nine specifically, withdrawal likely looks like retreating into comfortable routines and private space — the peace of a familiar, settled environment. This is not social withdrawal in a dramatic sense; it can be invisible from the outside.
- The 'hard to read' descriptor from others is a natural consequence of the Withdrawn stance — the inner life is not naturally moved outward. The client's self-knowledge about their own wants may be genuinely limited precisely because turning inward is more about finding stillness than about self-inquiry.

Weave in: 'When things feel like too much, what do you naturally move toward — more contact with people, or more time in your own space? What does that look like for you?'

EMOTIONAL STYLE — POSITIVE

- The Positive Outlook style means this client tends to reframe difficulty toward the upside, minimize the negative, and maintain an optimistic or stable surface — sometimes at the cost of fully processing what's hard.
- For a Nine, Positive Outlook shows up as a tendency to smooth over conflict, focus on what's going well, and move away from anything too emotionally charged. It's not denial exactly — it's a structural preference for harmony over confrontation with difficulty.
- The risk for this client is that the Positive style combines with the Nine's self-forgetting to produce a pattern where genuine distress goes unacknowledged for a long time — until it surfaces as inertia, stubbornness, or the anxious Type 6 stress pattern they recognized.

Weave in: 'When something is bothering you — something that has real weight — what do you tend to do with it internally? Do you find yourself moving toward it or away from it?'

ATTACHMENT STYLE — ATTACHMENT

- The Attachment theme means this client's core concern is maintaining connection and belonging — the fear of disconnection, rupture, or being cut off from the group or relationship is near the center of their motivational structure.
- For a Nine, Attachment manifests as a deep desire to be included and to keep the peace within relationships — going along to get along, merging with others' preferences to maintain the sense of connection. The self-forgetting serves the attachment: by not asserting wants that might create conflict, the connection stays intact.
- This also helps explain the 'sometimes stubborn' quality — when this client does resist, it's often a structural response to something that feels like a threat to the stability of important connections or environments, not a willful assertion of preference.

Weave in: 'Think about a relationship that matters a lot to you. How much of yourself — your actual preferences, disagreements, wants — shows up in that relationship? What happens if something you want conflicts with what that person wants?'

COACHING NOTES FOR THIS SECTION

- The three frameworks together paint a coherent picture: a client who moves away from intensity (Withdrawn), smooths the surface (Positive), and organizes around connection (Attachment). These aren't three separate things — they're one integrated pattern. When you debrief frameworks, help the client see how they work together rather than presenting them as separate findings.
- The most productive angle is usually the Attachment piece — it gives the Nine a relational explanation for the self-forgetting that doesn't feel like pathology. 'You've learned to keep the peace by keeping yourself a little in the background' lands differently than 'you suppress your needs.'
- Pace this section carefully. The client has already named their shadow; they may be eager to go deep quickly. Stay with concrete examples and lived experience rather than abstraction.

Try asking: 'Where in your body do you feel it when something is off — when there's tension, or when you've been going along with something that isn't quite right for you? What does that feel like physically?'

4 • DEBRIEFING INSTINCT AND SUBTYPE

Their particular flavor of Type 9, and why it matters.

INSTINCT RANKING

SP NINE — THE SELF-PRESERVATION PEACEMAKER — HOW THE INSTINCT SHAPES THE TYPE

- The SP Nine seeks peace through the body and through the immediate environment — through comfort, routine, familiar pleasures, and the satisfaction of basic needs being reliably met. This is not the SO Nine's focus on group harmony or the SX Nine's pull toward deep merger with one other person; it's the peace of a well-ordered, comfortable, undisturbed daily life.
- The SP Nine's self-forgetting often looks like absorption into comfortable routines or activities — reading, eating, simple pleasures, familiar tasks — that provide a sense of okayness without requiring the effort of attending to deeper wants or direction. The momentum that gets lost ('I lose my own momentum') is partly lost into these appetitive, comfort-seeking patterns.
- 'Stability and presence — I keep things grounded' is a very SP Nine description of their gift: the groundedness is physical, environmental, and bodily, not primarily relational.
- The stubbornness that others notice is characteristically SP Nine: this client likely has particular patterns, routines, or ways of doing things that feel load-bearing for their sense of peace — and when those are disrupted or challenged, a quiet but firm resistance emerges.

WHY THIS SUBTYPE CAN BE EASY TO MISS

- SP Nines can be mistaken for Type 1 because of their reliability, follow-through, and quiet orderliness — especially compared to the more obviously drifting SO or SX Nine. The distinction is motivation: the SP Nine's structure is in service of comfort and peace, not correctness or improvement.
- The SP Nine's peace-seeking can look like contentment or genuine well-being, especially to outside observers. The self-forgetting is interior and often not visible — this is a client who likely functions well and appears stable. The gap between outer stability and inner directionlessness can be invisible to everyone, including the client.
- The SP Nine is sometimes the hardest Nine to recognize precisely because they have traction in the world — they follow through, they show up, they seem solid. The core Nine wound (self-forgetting, agenda-merging) is present but buried under a layer of competent, reliable, comfort-organized functioning.

COACHING NOTES

- When introducing the SP instinct, use their own language: 'stability,' 'grounded,' 'steady.' Ask where in their daily life they feel most at peace — this will almost certainly surface SP-Nine-specific data (comfortable routines, familiar environments, bodily ease).
- The stubbornness is a useful entry point for the SP instinct — gently wonder together what it's in service of. 'What feels like it would be lost if you changed that?' often surfaces the underlying peace-structure.
- Be careful not to pathologize the comfort-seeking. The SP Nine's orientation toward simple pleasures and routine is also genuinely nourishing — the invitation is toward consciousness about when it becomes a substitute for self-direction, not away from it entirely.

Try asking: 'What does a really good day look like for you — not a big achievement day, just a day where you feel genuinely at ease? Walk me through what that looks like.'

5 • DEBRIEFING WINGS, LINES, AND RESOURCES

What they have available, especially under pressure.

STRESS MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 6

- Under stress, this client moves toward Type 6 — and they recognized the pattern cleanly: increased anxiety, worst-case thinking, seeking reassurance. For an SP Nine, this stress movement often has a particular flavor of the familiar stability feeling suddenly precarious — routines feel inadequate, the reliable comfort structures stop working, and a spiral of anxious anticipation sets in.
- The movement into 6 is a signal that the Nine's dissipating strategies have been overwhelmed — the peace can no longer be maintained by going along and staying comfortable. What's underneath has broken through.
- Coaching angle: help the client develop early-warning awareness of this movement. The reassurance-seeking is usually the most visible signal — asking them to notice when they start pulling others in to stabilize their inner state can be a practical access point.

Try asking: 'When you notice yourself starting to worry about worst-case scenarios or wanting reassurance from people around you — what's usually been happening in the days before that? What's the buildup look like?'

SECURITY MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 3

- In ease, this client moves toward Type 3 — more energy, more productivity, a clearer sense of direction and accomplishment. For a Nine, this is the experience of actually inhabiting themselves: wanting something, moving toward it, feeling the satisfaction of progress.
- The security movement is one of the most important growth levers for this client precisely because it mirrors the shadow they named. 'I lose my own momentum' under ordinary conditions — but in security, the momentum returns. The question is what conditions create that felt safety.
- Coaching angle: help the client map what was happening when they felt that Type 3 energy. What was present? What was absent? This can help them begin to create those conditions more deliberately rather than waiting for them to arise.

Try asking: 'You mentioned recognizing a version of yourself that feels more energized and directed. Can you think of a specific time when you felt that way? What was going on — what made that possible?'

WINGS — TYPE 8 AND TYPE 1

- The Nine sits between Type 8 and Type 1. The Eight wing brings directness, a stronger sense of personal power, and the capacity to assert and confront — when this client accesses their 8 wing, they may find an ability to hold their ground and move decisively that doesn't always feel native.
- The One wing brings order, discernment, and a sense of principle — when this client accesses their 1 wing, they may find a sharper sense of right and wrong, a more critical inner voice, and a greater attention to quality and correctness. The 'sometimes stubborn' descriptor from others may have some 1-wing flavor.

- SP Nines often have a more visible One wing simply because the orderliness of SP structure and the One's preference for correctness and tidiness can look similar. It's worth exploring which wing feels more alive or more accessible to this client.
- Neither wing is better — they offer different resources. The 8 wing offers the capacity to take up space and assert; the 1 wing offers the capacity to discern and hold standards. Both are growth resources for a Nine who is learning to know and pursue what they want.

Try asking: 'Do you notice yourself ever feeling a stronger pull toward being decisive and holding your ground — or more toward wanting things to be done right and properly? Do either of those feel more like you?'

6 • IF THE CONVERSATION GOES SIDeways

What to do depending on how they receive the hypothesis.

IF THEY RESONATE STRONGLY

- When the client strongly recognizes the type — especially the self-forgetting piece, which they've already named — resist the pull to stay in the recognition. Recognition is the beginning, not the destination. Move quickly from 'yes, that's me' to 'and what do you want to do about it?'
- Use the security movement as a bridge: 'You know what it feels like to have direction and energy — you recognized it. What would it take to make that available to you more of the time?' This moves the client from observer to agent.
- Strong resonance in a Nine can sometimes be its own form of merging — agreeing with the framing, absorbing it, and then not moving. Watch for enthusiastic recognition that doesn't produce any specificity about what they actually want to change or explore.

What's one thing you want to be different in your life that this pattern has been getting in the way of?

IF THEY PUSH BACK OR DISAGREE

- Do not defend the hypothesis. If the client pushes back, get curious: 'What doesn't fit? Tell me more about that.' The Nine's pushback is often quiet — a slight pulling back, a 'I'm not sure that's quite right' — rather than direct disagreement. Honor it.
- The most likely alternate to explore is Type 2. The client's warmth, kindness, and relational attunement are genuine and visible to others. The distinguishing question is motivational: is the care connected to a need to be needed or valued by others (Type 2), or is it more about maintaining harmony and connection (Type 9)? Let them sit with that.
- If the client identifies more with the Type 1 pattern — orderly, principled, self-critical — this is worth taking seriously given the SP instinct and the reported stubbornness. Ask about the inner critic: is there a persistent voice evaluating whether things are being done right? A strong, judgmental inner critic points toward Type 1; a quieter, more diffuse sense of things being off points toward Type 9.

- Hold the hypothesis lightly and make clear that the conversation matters more than the scoring. If something doesn't land, that's data — not a failure.

Most likely alternate type: Type 2 — The Giver

Key distinguishing question: The key distinguishing question is: when you give, care for, or attune to others, is there a part of you that needs to feel valued or needed in return — or is it more about keeping the peace and staying connected, independent of whether you're recognized for it?

IF THEY'RE CONFUSED OR NEED MORE CLARITY

- If the client feels confused or can't find themselves in the type description, find the foothold first — go back to what they named directly: 'I forget what I actually want.' Ask them to stay with that one piece and describe it more. That's the entry point regardless of type.
- Frame the confusion as useful: 'The fact that this doesn't fully land is interesting. What part feels right, and what part doesn't? Let's start there.' What doesn't fit is often as diagnostic as what does.
- Sometimes confusion in a Nine is the pattern itself — the Nine's tendency to lose themselves in the framing of others can produce a kind of assessment-merging where they're not sure what they actually think about the result. Gently name this if it seems present.

Setting aside what the assessment said — when you read the description of losing your own momentum and forgetting what you want, how much does that actually feel true to your experience?
