SO 7 — The Sacrifice (Social Seven)

MEDIUM CONFIDENCE

This report is designed as a session prep tool — organized around the debrief conversation you'll have with your client, not around how the assessment engine arrived at its hypothesis. Read Section 1 for the quick read. Use Sections 2 through 5 as a companion during the debrief itself. Section 6 offers contingency guidance depending on how the conversation unfolds.

THE READ

This client presents with language that reads almost entirely as Type 2 on the surface — 'warm, generous, devoted,' 'selfless, visionary, always there' — but the structural data holds for SO 7, the Sacrifice counter-type, with medium confidence. The tell is in the specificity of the greatest strength: 'the ability to inspire people toward something bigger than themselves.' That's not a Helper's language — that's a Seven's language about shared possibility. The burnout shadow is fully coherent with the counter-type: this is a Seven who channels their avoidance of limitation into limitless giving, and who eventually hits the wall they were trying to outrun. The one genuine ambiguity is the Habit of Mind lean toward Type 2 patterns, which keeps Two live as a real alternative and should be directly explored in session.

GOING IN

- MEDIUM confidence overall — Type 7 holds on Object Relations (Frustration group cleanly distinguishes from Type 2's Attachment group) and confirmed stress/security architecture, but the Habit of Mind lean toward Type 2 and the Compliant Hornebian answer mean this is not a clean landing.

- Counter-type framing is essential: the standard Seven description (pleasure-seeking, option-generating, difficulty with commitment) will likely not resonate. Lead with the SO 7 Sacrifice description and watch for recognition.
- The Type 2 alternative is live and should be treated as a genuine hypothesis to explore, not simply as a lookalike to dismiss. The key distinguishing question — giving from abundance vs. giving from need — is the most important probe in this debrief.
- Center confidence is LOW (gap of 2 between Head and Heart). Do not rely on Center as a primary entry point. Lead with Stage 0 language and instinct patterns instead.
- The client's open response was empty — no additional context or self-typing to factor in.

1A • COUNTER-TYPE CONSIDERATIONS

WHY THIS MATTERS

- SO 7 — Sacrifice is the counter-type that most consistently fails to recognize itself as Seven. The standard Seven description (hedonistic, commitment-avoidant, pleasure-focused) is so far from this client's self-presentation that presenting it without counter-type framing risks immediate and complete non-recognition.
- The counter-type pattern here is load-bearing for the debrief: the entire reason the Type 2 alternative stays live is that SO 7's behavioral surface is almost identical to Two. If you don't name that directly, the client may simply decide they're a Two and disengage from the Seven hypothesis.
- The developmental implications of Seven vs. Two are meaningfully different. For a Seven, the growth edge is learning to stay with limitation, depth, and the full range of experience — including difficulty. For a Two, it's learning to receive, to have needs, to give from genuine fullness rather than from hunger. Getting this right matters for the work.
- Burnout as the presenting shadow is interpretively different in each type: for SO 7, it's the exhaustion of running from limitation through limitless giving; for Two, it's the depletion of giving to secure love. Both sound similar — the distinction is in what the giving is doing internally.

STANDARD VS. COUNTER-TYPE PRESENTATION

- Standard Seven: pleasure-seeking, option-generating, future-oriented, difficulty with commitment and staying present with pain. Often reads as scattered, enthusiastic, avoidant of depth.
- SO 7 — Sacrifice: channels Seven's love of possibility and abundance outward into service, vision, and collective joy. Looks selfless, devoted, inspiring. The avoidance of limitation is enacted through limitless giving rather than through personal pleasure-seeking.
- What they share: the core Seven orientation toward possibility and away from limitation; the high energy and tirelessness; the capacity to generate enthusiasm in others; the structural difficulty with sustained contact with their own pain or need.
- What distinguishes them: the SO 7 gives because it feels like abundance — 'I have so much to offer, let me share it' — whereas the Two gives because connection and being needed feels essential. The question is whether the giving feels like generosity or like necessity.

COACHING NOTES

- Introduce the counter-type framing early and explicitly: 'There's a particular expression of Type 7 that looks almost nothing like the standard description — I want to share that with you before we go further, because I think it might be the one that actually lands.'
- Use the client's own language as the bridge: 'inspiring people toward something bigger than themselves' — name that as a Seven quality, specifically. The love of possibility directed outward. Watch for recognition in that moment.
- If the client pushes back toward Two, don't defend the Seven hypothesis — pivot to the distinguishing question directly: 'Let's sit with both of those for a moment. When you think about the giving and the devotion — what does it feel like from the inside? Is it more like sharing something you have in abundance, or more like something you need to do to feel okay?'

2 • DEBRIEFING CORE MOTIVATION AND WORLDVIEW

How to present the heart of the type and connect it to their own words.

THE CORE PATTERN

- Type 7's core motivation is the pursuit of possibility, abundance, and freedom from limitation — and the avoidance of pain, deprivation, or being trapped. For SO 7, this doesn't show up as personal hedonism but as a kind of visionary generosity: the belief that there is always more, always a bigger future, always another possibility — and that sharing that is both the gift and the point.
- The Seven worldview is fundamentally anticipatory: the mind is always moving forward, toward what could be, generating options, reframing difficulty. For SO 7, that forward motion is embedded in the group's future — 'what we can become' rather than 'what I can experience.'
- The core avoidance is limitation, deprivation, being trapped in pain or scarcity. For SO 7, this avoidance gets enacted through tireless service: if I keep giving, keep inspiring, keep making things bigger, I never have to stop and sit with what might be missing or painful.
- Burnout is the structural shadow of this pattern: the avoidance of limitation eventually becomes its own limitation. The tirelessness runs into the ground.

WHAT THEIR RESPONSES SHOWED

- 'Devoted to the people and causes I care about, tireless' — this is a Seven who has organized their energy around external commitment. Note the word 'tireless': it's both a self-description and, read carefully, a kind of pride in not stopping.
- 'The ability to inspire people toward something bigger than themselves' — this is the SO 7's signature gift named clearly. The pleasure is in the shared vision, the collective possibility. This is what distinguishes this presentation from Two: the orientation is outward toward something larger, not inward toward the relational bond.
- 'Selfless, visionary, always there — sometimes to a fault' — the 'sometimes to a fault' is the shadow peeking through. Others are already naming the cost of the tirelessness, even if gently.
- 'Burnout' as the most problematic quality is the most diagnostically coherent piece of Stage 0 language for this hypothesis. It is the predictable consequence of a Seven who has located their avoidance of limitation in limitless outward giving.

COACHING NOTES

- Open with the strength: 'inspiring people toward something bigger than themselves.' Name it, reflect it, let them feel seen in it before you move toward the shadow. This client has built a significant identity around that gift.
- The move from strength to shadow is most alive through the burnout door: 'You named burnout as your most problematic quality. I'm curious what that's like when it arrives — what it does to the tirelessness.' This is where the avoidance of limitation starts to become visible.
- Watch for intellectualization or pivoting to the group when asked about personal experience. SO 7s often speak fluently about collective vision and the people they serve, and more haltingly about their own inner state. When this happens, gently name it: 'I notice we moved to the group just then — I'm curious what's happening for you personally.'

Try asking: 'When you say you're devoted to people and causes — what does that devotion feel like from the inside? Is it more like an overflow, something you have so much of that you naturally share it? Or does it feel more like a pull, something you need to do?'

3 · DEBRIEFING PATTERNS OF THINKING, FEELING, AND BEHAVING

What to expect and what to watch for as you walk through type patterns.

CENTERS OF INTELLIGENCE

Body Center		0 / 18
Heart Center		0 / 18
Head Center		0 / 18

LIKELY TO RESONATE EASILY

- Genuine optimism and the ability to see possibility where others see obstacles
- Quick thinking, versatility, and a gift for synthesizing ideas across domains
- Real warmth and enthusiasm that energizes groups and relationships

MAY TAKE MORE CAREFUL UNPACKING

- Scattered attention — too many open loops, too many half-started projects, too many possibilities
- Avoidance of pain, limitation, and commitment that would require you to stay when things get hard
- A tendency to reframe difficulty toward the positive so quickly that real feelings don't get processed

MAY BE HARDEST TO SEE

- The hardest thing for SO 7 to see is that the tireless giving is also an avoidance strategy — that staying in motion, staying devoted, staying outward-facing is a way of not stopping long enough to feel limitation, loss, or their own pain. This client named burnout as the problematic quality but may not yet have the full picture of what the tirelessness is doing.

- The reframing habit is particularly invisible to this pattern: SO 7 will often convert difficulty into possibility so quickly and so genuinely that they don't register having done it. Asking them to stay with what's hard — before moving to what's possible — is often the most disorienting invitation you can offer.
- The Stage 0 phrase 'sometimes to a fault' (from others' description) is worth sitting with: others can already see the cost more clearly than the client can. This is the shadow gap — the client describes themselves as tireless, others describe them as 'always there — sometimes to a fault.' That gap is where the work lives.

HOW THE CLIENT APPEARS TO MOVE — THE THREE FRAMEWORK SIGNALS

These are cross-referenced patterns that showed up consistently in their responses. Each offers a different lens on the type — worth weaving in conversationally rather than introducing as categories.

SOCIAL STYLE — COMPLIANT

- The Compliant Hornebian answer is the data point that keeps Type 2 live — it suggests this client moves toward others and toward what's needed from them, rather than asserting their own agenda independently.
- For SO 7, Compliant is somewhat paradoxical: Sevens are classically Assertive in the Hornebian model. The Compliant answer here likely reflects the counter-type's genuine orientation toward the group's needs — but it's worth exploring whether compliance also carries any of Two's need to be needed.
- In session, notice when this client defers, adjusts their vision to fit others' needs, or subordinates their own preferences to the group's direction. Is that generosity, or is there something underneath it?

Weave in: 'When the group or the people you're serving need something different from what you envisioned — what happens for you? Do you find it easy to adjust, or is there an internal tension there?'

EMOTIONAL STYLE — POSITIVE OUTLOOK

- The Positive Outlook harmonic result is fully consistent with both Type 7 and Type 2, and it's one of the most behaviorally visible patterns in this client's presentation.
- For this client, Positive Outlook shows up as vision — 'inspiring people toward something bigger than themselves' is Positive Outlook applied at scale. The ability to hold and communicate the possibility is both the gift and the mechanism for avoiding the full weight of difficulty.
- The coaching edge here is in the gap: what isn't being acknowledged as hard, painful, or limiting? Where is the reframe happening before the feeling is felt? The burnout is the moment when Positive Outlook runs out of runway.

Weave in: 'I'm curious about the moments when the vision doesn't hold — when the possibility feels distant or the tirelessness hits a wall. What happens then? What does that feel like?'

ATTACHMENT STYLE — FRUSTRATION

- The Frustration Object Relations result is the clearest Type 7 discriminator in the dataset — Twos belong to the Attachment group, not Frustration. This is the data point that holds the Seven hypothesis in place.
- Frustration types (1, 4, 7) experience an underlying sense that what they have is not quite enough — there's always something more, something missing, something they're reaching toward. For Seven, this gets managed by moving toward the next possibility before the frustration can fully register.
- For this client, the Frustration pattern may show up as a restlessness within the giving — a sense that the current vision, cause, or group isn't quite the full expression of what's possible. This can look like tirelessness from the outside and feel like devotion from the inside, while underneath there's a subtle dissatisfaction that keeps the engine running.

Weave in: 'Is there ever a moment where what you're building or offering feels like enough — where you can stop and say, this is it? Or is there always a sense that there's more to do, more to give, a bigger version of this still ahead?'

COACHING NOTES FOR THIS SECTION

- Don't lead with the framework labels — lead with the client's own language and let the framework descriptions illuminate rather than categorize. This client is likely to engage intellectually with the system; watch for that becoming a way of staying at a comfortable distance from direct recognition.
- The most important pattern to surface gently is the gap between how the client experiences their giving (tireless devotion, abundance) and what it may also be doing (keeping them moving, keeping limitation at bay). This is best approached through specific examples rather than general framing.
- Pace matters here: this client has built a significant identity around being warm, generous, and selfless. Any framing that sounds like 'your giving is actually self-protective' will land as a challenge to that identity. The invitation is curiosity, not reframe — 'I wonder what the tirelessness is also doing for you.'

Try asking: 'When you imagine slowing down — really stopping, not just pausing before the next thing — what comes up in your body? What does that feel like?'

4 • DEBRIEFING INSTINCT AND SUBTYPE

Their particular flavor of Type 7, and why it matters.

INSTINCT RANKING

SO 7 — THE SACRIFICE (SOCIAL SEVEN) — HOW THE INSTINCT SHAPES THE TYPE

- The Social instinct in a Seven redirects the type's characteristic love of abundance and possibility outward toward the group's flourishing. This client's 'ability to inspire people toward something bigger than themselves' is the SO 7's dominant gift — the joy is located in the collective vision, not in personal experience.

- SO 7's giving has a quality of genuine abundance that distinguishes it from Two: the client gives because they experience themselves as having something to share, a vision to offer, a possibility to illuminate. The giving isn't from hunger — or at least, that's the self-experience. Whether there's also a hunger underneath is the live question.
- The Social instinct also means this client's pain is most likely to show up in relational or community contexts — when the group fractures, when the vision doesn't land, when others don't share the enthusiasm. Burnout in SO 7 often arrives after sustained investment in a cause or community that didn't deliver what was hoped.
- The 'sometimes to a fault' in others' description is the Social instinct's shadow: SO 7 can become so embedded in service to the group that their own needs, limits, and experience become genuinely invisible to them — and occasionally to the groups they serve.

WHY THIS SUBTYPE CAN BE EASY TO MISS

- SO 7 is the counter-type most likely to be mistyped as Two. The warmth, generosity, selflessness, and devotion to others are real — they're not performance. This makes the mistype feel accurate to the client and produces immediate non-recognition when the standard Seven description is introduced.
- The standard Seven markers (options-orientation, difficulty with commitment, restlessness) are largely invisible in this presentation. SO 7's commitment to people and causes can look like a Two's need for connection or a Six's loyalty — the avoidance of limitation is thoroughly disguised in service.
- Burnout is the diagnostic tell. Twos burn out from giving to secure love; Sevens burn out from giving to avoid limitation. The surface presentation is almost identical — the interior experience is different. This requires direct, careful conversation to distinguish.

COACHING NOTES

- Introduce the SO 7 counter-type name and description before presenting any standard Seven material. Something like: 'There's a particular form of Seven whose whole orientation is toward giving and inspiring others — sometimes called the Sacrifice Seven. The standard Seven description won't fit this person at all. Let me describe this one and see if it lands differently.'
- Watch for the moment when the client recognizes themselves in the counter-type description — particularly in 'tireless,' 'inspiring toward something bigger,' and the burnout pattern. That recognition is the foothold.
- The instinct probe is most useful around the question of where the giving lives: is it in one-to-one relationships (SX), in personal security (SP), or in the community/cause/group (SO)? This client's language strongly suggests SO, but it's worth naming and confirming.

Try asking: 'When you think about where your energy most naturally goes — is it toward a few deep personal relationships, toward your own security and stability, or toward something bigger — a group, a cause, a community? Which of those feels most like home for you?'

5 • DEBRIEFING WINGS, LINES, AND RESOURCES

What they have available, especially under pressure.

STRESS MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 1

- Type 7's stress point is Type 1: under pressure, the expansive, possibility-generating energy tightens into judgment, criticism, and a fixation on what's wrong. The client confirmed this pattern — when stressed, they move toward perfectionistic, critical territory more than toward controlling/demanding (Two's stress point at Eight).
- For this client, stress-to-One is likely to show up as a sudden shift in register: the inspiring, visionary energy becomes pointed and exacting — toward others who aren't meeting the standard, or toward themselves for not doing enough. This can be quite disorienting for the people around them who are used to the generous, positive presentation.
- The coaching angle: burnout is often the precipitating condition for stress-to-One. Watch for whether this client's burnout narrative includes a chapter where they became critical, impatient, or rigid — that's the stress movement in action.

Try asking: 'When you've hit the burnout wall — what happens to your relationship to standards? Do you find yourself becoming more critical, more exacting, more focused on what's not right? What does that look like?'

SECURITY MOVEMENT — TOWARD TYPE 5

- Type 7's security point is Type 5: in genuine ease, the normally outward-facing, forward-moving energy settles into depth, focus, and an ability to go inward. The client confirmed this pattern — in ease, they access stillness, concentration, and the capacity to be absorbed in one thing.
- This is a significant resource to name explicitly: the Five-ish quality of going deep, staying present, being absorbed — this is available to this client and is what real rest looks like for them. It's not inactivity; it's depth rather than breadth.
- The security movement can be a key growth edge: if the client can learn to create conditions of genuine safety for themselves — not through giving, but through boundaries and self-care — they get more access to the depth and stillness that the Type 5 security point offers.

Try asking: 'When you've been able to really rest — not just pause before the next thing, but genuinely slow down — what does that feel like? Can you remember a time when you were absorbed in something deeply, just for yourself, without needing to share it or make it about others?'

WINGS — TYPE 6 AND TYPE 8

- Type 7's two wings are Type 6 and Type 8. Each brings a meaningfully different flavor to the Seven pattern.
- The 6-wing (7w6) adds loyalty, warmth, and a relational quality to Seven's enthusiasm. For SO 7, a 6-wing deepens the commitment to community and to specific people — this Seven cares about the group not just as a vehicle for vision but as a genuine bond. The anxiety of Six can also show up as doubt about whether the vision is good enough, or whether they're doing enough.
- The 8-wing (7w8) adds power, directness, and a willingness to confront to Seven's expansiveness. For SO 7, an 8-wing produces a more driving, insistent quality in the leadership and inspiration — this Seven can push others hard in service of the vision. The intensity of Eight can tip toward the controlling stress pattern more readily.

- For this client, the 'tireless' quality and the devotion to people and causes could fit either wing — but the warmth and relational language in Stage 0 may lean slightly toward 6-wing. This is worth exploring lightly and letting the client lead.

Try asking: 'When you're at your most energized in your work with people — do you find you're more drawn to building deep loyalty and trust with specific people, or more energized by pushing the vision forward boldly, even when it means challenging others?'

6 • IF THE CONVERSATION GOES SIDEWAYS

What to do depending on how they receive the hypothesis.

IF THEY RESONATE STRONGLY

- When the client strongly recognizes the SO 7 counter-type description — particularly the tireless giving, the inspirational vision, and the burnout shadow — use that recognition as a bridge to the growth edge rather than staying in the description. Recognition is the beginning of the work, not the destination.
- Move from 'yes, this is me' toward specificity and commitment: 'Given that you recognize this pattern — what's the most important thing you want to understand about it? What would be most useful to explore?' The Seven's tendency to move quickly can mean recognition becomes another thing to be enthusiastic about rather than something to stay with.
- Watch for the reframe: 'Now that I understand I'm a Seven, I can just...' — the pattern of converting insight into forward motion before sitting with what it's actually pointing to. Gently name it if it shows up.

If there's one thing about this pattern you'd most want to understand better — not to fix it, just to see it more clearly — what would it be?

IF THEY PUSH BACK OR DISAGREE

- If the client pushes back on Type 7 — most likely because they identify more strongly with Type 2 — do not defend the hypothesis. Instead, name the live alternative directly: 'That makes complete sense — Type 2 is the closest lookalike for this particular expression of Seven, and the difference is genuinely subtle. Let me name what distinguishes them and see which feels closer to your actual inner experience.'
- The most useful move is to put the distinguishing question on the table: giving from abundance vs. giving from need. Ask them to locate themselves in a specific recent experience of giving or inspiring — not in general, but in a particular moment. What was driving it?
- If the client claims to be a Two and the Seven hypothesis continues to feel off, hold both lightly and let the session conversation generate more data. The Frustration Object Relations result is the strongest structural evidence for Seven, and it's worth naming: 'One piece of data that keeps me curious about Seven for you is this underlying sense that there's always more to give, more to do, a bigger version of what's possible still ahead. Does that resonate at all?

- Be prepared for the possibility that this client is a Two — the data keeps it live. If the session conversation consistently points toward Two, the hypothesis should shift.

Most likely alternate type: Type 2 — The Helper

Key distinguishing question: The key distinguishing question is whether the giving, devoting, and inspiring flows from a felt sense of abundance — 'I have so much to share' — or from a deeper need to be needed, to secure love and connection through what you offer.

IF THEY'RE CONFUSED OR NEED MORE CLARITY

- If the client is confused — particularly if neither Seven nor Two lands clearly — find the foothold in what they do recognize. 'Let's set the type names aside for a moment. What in what we've been talking about has felt most true to your experience?' Start with what resonates, even if it's small.
- Confusion is often most productive when you treat what doesn't fit as equally useful data: 'What specifically doesn't feel right? That's at least as interesting as what does.' The type system is a map, and the places where the map doesn't match the territory are worth exploring.
- For this particular ambiguity, the burnout shadow is often the clearest entry point. Regardless of type, there's something real in that experience — and asking the client to describe what leads to burnout and what it feels like to be in it will often surface the motivational material that clarifies the type.

Try asking: 'Can you describe a specific time you burned out — what was happening, what were you giving yourself to, and what did it feel like when you hit the wall? I'm not looking for the story of it — I'm curious about what was driving the giving in the first place.'

6A • TYPE CONFUSION OBSERVATION BLOCK

Types in question: Type 7 and Type 2. Use only if the client brought in their type confusion observation during the session.

WHAT TO DO WITH WHAT THEY BRING

- Bring the three key differentiating data points into the conversation explicitly: the Frustration Object Relations result (Seven, not Two), the confirmed stress architecture (Seven moves to One, not Eight), and the Habit of Mind lean toward Two (attending to others' needs and approval). Present these not as verdicts but as a genuine puzzle worth sitting with together.
- The most diagnostically useful probe for this ambiguity is the interior experience of giving. Ask the client to describe a specific, recent instance of giving, inspiring, or being 'tireless' for someone — and then ask: 'In that moment, what were you getting from it? What would it have felt like to stop, to say no, to step back?' The answer will usually point clearly toward one type or the other.
- Listen for what the client does when you name limitation. Sevens will typically pivot toward possibility — 'but there's always more we can do' — while Twos will typically pivot toward the relationship — 'but they needed me.' Both moves are subtle and often fast; slow them down.

- Hold the ambiguity openly with the client rather than resolving it prematurely. This is a case where sitting with two live hypotheses and letting the client's life experience be the data is more honest and more useful than forcing a landing.

IF THE OBSERVATION DIDN'T YIELD CLEAR DATA

- SO 7 is structurally difficult to confirm through self-report because the counter-type pattern produces behavior that the client genuinely experiences as Two-like. The giving, devotion, and selflessness are real — they're not a performance of something else. This means the client's own self-observation may not be the most reliable guide to distinguishing the types.
- Type 2's giving is experienced from the inside as natural, necessary, and relational — 'of course I help, that's just who I am.' SO 7's giving is experienced as abundance-sharing — 'I have so much to offer, why wouldn't I give it?' These can feel very similar in the giving moment; the distinction is most visible in the aftermath, particularly around what it costs and what it produces internally.
- The Habit of Mind ambiguity (lean toward Two's attention pattern) may reflect genuine Two patterns operating alongside or beneath the Seven pattern — or it may reflect the SO 7's authentic relational attunement. This is not something the assessment can resolve; it requires sustained, direct conversation.

Try asking: 'If you imagine a week where you gave nothing to others — no inspiring, no serving, no devoting yourself to people or causes — just completely withdrew from that role — what would that feel like? What would you be afraid of losing?'
